THURSDAY MORNING.........................MARCH 9.

The Last of the Blannerhassetts.

The eloquence of Wm. Wirt, and the memorable conspiracy of Aaron Burr, made the name of Herman Blannerhassett as familiar as a household word to the people of this country some forty years ago. His fame, misfortunes and history, embalmed in the gorgeous eloquence of Wirt, are still familiar to many. But whilst every declamatory school boy recites with a voice alternating from a shrill treble to a hoarse growling bass, the glowing extract from the gifted orator's famous speech upon the occasion of Burr's trial, none, perhaps, ever enquired the fate of the noble Irishman after the failure of Burr's great conspiracy. When the treachery, heartlessness and villainy of Burr had destroyed poor Blannerhassett's almost Eden like palatial home on the Ohio, and involved the unsuspecting owner in his degradation and ruin, few enquired his fate and subsequent history.

Herman Blannerhassett, all of our readers will perhaps recollect, was the son of an Irish nobleman who emigrated to this country in 1797. Possessed of ample means, he purchased a beautiful island on the Ohio river, and expended nearly a hundred thousand dollars in the erection of an edifice remarkable for its almost Aladdin beauty of decorations and proportions. The ornamental grounds in their beauty, and floral and horticultural ornaments, rendered Blannerhassett's residence an earthly paradise. Surrounded by all the appliances of the most refined luxury, with a magnificent library, costly furniture, superb paintings, blessed by the society of a refined wife and intelligent children, his wealth and prosperity excited the admiration and envy of all who glided by his residence upon the waters of the Ohio. Seduced by the eloquence of Burr, Blannerhassett, at an unfortunate moment became the confidante of Burr; and was, as that person's accomplice, arrested, conveyed to Richmond, cast into prison, but discharged after the acquittal of the principal conspirator.

The pecuniary embarrassments of Blannerhasset pressing heavily upon him, he was forced to sell his magnificent palace and estate, and misfortune dogged his footsteps, until he died in Ireland in 1828, broken-hearted and almost a pauper. His wife and only son returned to New York in the year 1831, in very reduced circumstances. The mother died many years ago, and until a few weeks since, the world had forgotten the once famous Blannerhasset, and his family.

The following history of the son of Blannerhassett, taken recently from a perfectly reliable source, illustrates with melancholy force the strange and remarkable revolutions of the wheel of fortune, in elevating the lowly, and also in crushing the children of the rich in the mire of the Slough of Despond.

A few charitable ladies, a short time since, visited the FIVE POINTS in NEW YORK—that most horrible of modern Alsatias,—upon an errand of mercy. Here among the lowest, the vilest, the most wretched of God's creatures, in a damp, low, unfurnished, comfortless room, they found a delicate, refined looking old man, destitute of every comfort of life, without sufficient bread or clothing, forced to associate with the most ruffianly and unprincipled of the population of New York. He was the only child of the once wealthy and distinguished Blannerhasset. The son of a man who had set up merchants, patronized literature and the fine arts, and been honored and courted by thousands, who had united with Burr to conquer an empire, was found almost starving in a cellar in the vilest portion of New York. One alone had proved faithful to the last of the Blannerhassetts—one alone clung to the last spar of a shipwrecked, broken, forgotten family. An old negro woman, a slave of Herman Blannerhasset, in the days of his prosperity, who had held young Blannerhasset in her arms, when his father was an affluent gentleman and associate of Burr—was found by the Samaritans who visited her master, devoting all of her remaining strength to her feeble and helpless master. Forgotten by the world, this faithful slave afforded to the son of the celebrated Blannerhassett—what the world had denied him—bread, and an humble roof to protect him from the inclemency of a northern winter. What a moral does this point of the instability and uncertainty of worldly wealth and position—the only surviving son of Blannerhasset, perishing almost for want of the necessities of life, in FIVE POINTS, and supported by the exertions of a faithful negro!

The English Reform Bill.

The bill to reform the representation of England and Wales, just proposed by Lord John Russell, (and a digest of which we lately laid before our readers,) is unquestionably a great advance on the Reform Bill of 1832. By abolishing the small boroughs and increasing the representation in large districts, it approximates, at least towards justice.

But the radical faults of the bill are that it refuses to recognize the right of universal suffrage, while it preserves the old feudal idea that Parliament ought to represent estates and not citizens. The latter idea, indeed, could not be abandoned without revolutionizing the British constitution entirely. For not only would the bishops, in that event, have to be expelled from the House of Lords, but the Peers themselves would have to be abolished; nay, the representatives of the universities would also have to be driven from Parliament. For could a stop be made even here. For the members sit, either as knights of the shire, or as burgess delegates from some borough, and not, as in the United States, as Congressmen representing an arithmetical division of the whole people. The new Reform Bill, therefore, however objectionable it may be in other respects, is consistent with the British constitution.

But this is not what the radicals of England want. Their policy is not to reform the government, but to remodel it, though all of them, perhaps, are not fully aware that this is what they seek. Universal suffrage is plainly incompatible with the perpetuity of the existing institutions of Great Britain. The present government is that of a oligarchy, disguised under the forms of a monarchy, and universal suffrage would, in the end, inevitably overthrow this rule of the few. It would be only a question of time when the House of Lords should fall. It is true that the wealth of the Peers would perpetuate their influence long after their direct power had been taken away; but universal suffrage would finally destroy the law of primogeniture, and thus lay the axe to the root of the aristocracy; and when this was done, Great Britain would become really a republic, whether the executive was called king or President. The radicals are not strong enough, however, to carry universal suffrage yet. But the government of England is becoming liberalized rapidly, and in a generation or two the movement may succeed.

Meantime it is doubtful if Lord John's bill will pass, for the radicals think it grants too little, while the Tories and Whigs generally regard it as conceding too much.—Phil. Ledger.

A CHAPTER OF SHOCKING ACCIDENTS.—On Friday night, Mr. Theodore Yahrling, employed in the flouring mill of his father-in-law, Mr. Folmer, 3 miles east of this city, and known as Bedillion's Mill, was caught on a large vertical shaft, in rapid motion, by his clothes getting entangled in the machinery, and was carried up and around the shaft, striking many times against the surrounding timbers and machinery. He was horribly mangled, his left thigh and right ankle being both broken, and his breast mashed in. On Saturday, at 12 o'clock, death relieved him from his misery.

On the same night, a quantity of rock fell from the roof of the first tunnel east of this city on the Hempfield Railroad, falling upon two of the workmen, named James Hackett and James Kussick, severely injuring both of them. It is thought the former cannot recover. They have been taken to the hospital under the care of Dr. Campbell.

On Saturday morning, Mr. Thomas Young, a glass cutter at Sweeney & Son's Glass Works, while in the act of putting the belt on a drum, was caught by the belt and drawn around the shaft with great velocity. The shaft made some one hundred and sixty revolutions before the engine could be stopped. He had on two shirts, which, with his other clothing, was twisted so tightly around his body that they had to be cut off before he could be extricated. Notwithstanding he was almost literally skinned, not a bone was broken, and there is no appearance of internal injury. At last accounts he was recovering.—Wheeling Intel., March 6.
