THE early hour, three o'clock in the morning, at which the EXPRESS TRAIN starts for the East, from Pittsburgh, had made it very inconvenient for travelers going by that train, compelling them to be aroused at a most uncomfortable time, (say 2 o'clock A. PITTSBURGH GAZETTE.

MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 20, 1853.

FOREIGN NEWS BY THE ASIA.

[Correspondence of the N. York Commercial Advertiser.]

LONDON, June 3, 1853.

The present mail takes out the rather startling intelligence of a rise of a half per cent. in the Bank of England rate of discount. Its causes, however, are capable of immediate explanation; and the measure is in no way an indication of any apprehensions of a permanent increase in the value of money.

With regard to political matters they still remain in the same disagreeable and anxious state. Yesterday, there was a report that Count Nesselrode had been sent from St. Petersburgh to Constantinople, and it was considered from his known moderation and experience, that this would at once lead to a removal of all difficulties in the dispute between Turkey and Russia. Subsequently, however, the statement has turned out to be false, or at all events doubtful; and there has been a proportionate reaction from the improved feeling which it occasioned.

One favorable item of intelligence has been received in an announcement that diplomatic intercourse has been resumed between Austria and Switzerland. There are tidings, however, of arrogant proceedings on the part of the Russian legation in Persia, as if it were the object of the Czar to resort to undisguised aggression in all quarters.

The Grain market has remained firm and an advance of 1s. per quarter has been obtained for Wheat.

FRANCE.—A heavy fall at the Bourse on the last day of the month, is a very disastrous event in Paris. It is settling day for the month's operations, and when a man cannot square his account with his agent de change, he is considered bankrupt and ruined. Day before yesterday, the 31st of May, the Turkish imbroglio and one or two other minor matters caused a panic among the speculators; in half an hour the Fives fell 80 centimes, and the Threes a franc and a quarter, or very nearly 2 per cent. The number of victims was large, and five suicides were mentioned yesterday in consequence. I was only able to assure myself of three, however. Per contra, there were one or two splendid operations executed. One gentleman risked his fortune in purchasing Threes, as the bell struck 3 o'clock—the hour at which the police clears the exchange. Yesterday, the rise was one franc and a half and the gentleman realized 80 sous on every 80 francs on the venture of the day before.

TURKEY.—In the correspondence of the London Times we find the following narrative of what occurred at Constantinople, antecedent to the withdrawal of Prince Menschikoff. The letters are dated at Constantinople, May 12:—

Diplomatic relations with Russia have been suspended. Redschid Pasha announced such to be the case to Prince Menschikoff on the morning of the 18th. The Prince replied that he should leave Constantinople soon, and demanded that the answer of the Porte should be communicated to him officially. He afterwards sent his steamboat to Bessarabia to take on board the sacred ornaments and vessels belonging to the Russian chapel. The Prince was to leave in the course of the following week, and the affairs of the Embassy were, ad interim, to be transferred to the Minister of Denmark, (another account says to the Austrian Minister.)

The Resolution of the Porte had been come to immediately after a grand extraordinary Council, which lasted two days, that is, the 17th and 18th, and to which had been invited all the Ministers, the civil and military muchirs (functionaries,) Cassakiers, &c. They assembled to the number of 57, having the aged Khosreff and Raouf Pashas at their head. Among the former Ministers were observed Riza Pasha, Saffety Pasha, Nafiz Pasha, Fuad Effendi, Schekif Effendi, Chekiff Bey, Ziver Effendi, &c. The discussion was long, and the more eminent of the persons assembled spoke more than once. The latter declares that the negative reply on the question of the Russian Protectorate was unanimous, though I believe, some of the persons present were supposed to have had Russian tendencies.

Lord Stafford had been received by Redschid Pasha, with whom he had a long conference. Omar Pasha had received orders to repair with all speed with a division of the army to Schumla. The Redifs, or national militia, to the number of 260,000, had received orders to form themselves into several camps. One was to assemble at Rudchak, and the other at Broussa, in Turkey, in Asia, the place of residence of Abd-el-Kader. The fleet, under Achmet Pasha, was expected at Constantinople, and that of Abbas Pasha about the same time.

While the Cabinet Council was being held the chiefs of the corporations were summoned, and informed of the rupture of diplomatic relations with Russia. They were at the same time admonished to act with prudence and moderation, and to disregard the false rumors that malevolent people might put in circulation.

After the Cabinet Council was over, the Sultan addressed to the Ministers and the assembled functionaries a brief speech. He said that he had, with his Government, done all that depended on him to maintain with honor friendly relations with Russia; that he could not do more unless he had consented to his dishonor; that he had strong hopes the affair would be arranged amicably; but that if it were the will of God that war should break out, he would remember that he was the son of the Sultan's, and that he should do his utmost to show himself the worthy descendant of his successors.

These words, it is said, produced a great effect on the persons to whom they were addressed. The letters speak very warmly of the patriotic ardor exhibited in the Turkish capital among all classes, and the unanimity of the assembled ex-Ministers and chiefs, civil and military, even of those whose predilections were rather in favor of Russia. They state that the Sultan and his Government have made up their minds to reject the pretensions of Russia, and they repeat that they will resist to the last, and at all costs.

The names of England and France, but especially the former, are, it appears, in every one's mouth; and in this menacing state of affairs, the maintenance of the treaties of 1841 is constantly invoked. In Constantinople, as in Paris, it is now, it appears, asserted that Prince Menschikoff has exceeded the instructions he received from the Emperor, and whispers are heard that even a disavowal is not improbable. On this it would be difficult to say any thing; all is mere conjecture. It is stated that the Russian Ambassador in Paris appears very anxious to have it believed that the views of his Government are not at all of the violent kind supposed.

A Prussian officer, who held office in Turkey in 1848-49, has lately published statements which throw light upon the construction and condition of the Turkish army. He says:—

The journals in Government pay their exhibit on paper a brave army of 554,000 men ready and longing for action; but this army is a mere numerical estimate, a design; a plan for raising an army on the ruins of the ill-starred arms of Mahmoud II, on the foundation of the new divisions of the empire, which is yet unexplored in thousands of square miles, and the divisions of which are still for the most part unknown to the superior officials.

The system of recruiting is by lot; the recruiting district are based upon divisions of the land which have not as yet been officially ascertained and established. The old historical denominations and boundaries have been done away with, and thus endless confusion is caused. How little the interior is known may be inferred from the fact, that within four leagues of Constantinople there is "unexplored land."

Sultan Mahmoud II., who was a soldier, body and soul, and made greater progress in European reforms than any of the "powers that be" now in Turkey, felt, after the destruction of the janissaries in 1826, the necessity of creating another army assimilated to the military state and standing of European armies. He put himself at the head of his four companies of life guards, which he intended to form into a normal school for his new army; but the lamentable war with Russia, as well as the unsuccessful campaigns in Lower Asia and Syria, destroyed his arrangements in the bud. In spite of the great personal care and the enormous sums he bestowed on the furthering of his plans, he could never bring together an army of 50,000 men.

In 1839 a Prussian officer, known in Turkey as Riza Pasha, was engaged to construct an army, and though this engagement and the consequent reforms came to a speedy and premature end, the divisions of the army as arranged by him still remain. They are as follows:—the whole military force is divided into six armies (called order), each commanded by a field marshal (Muschi); each order is divided into two corps, under the command of generals of division (Ferik).

Each order is composed of six infantry, four cavalry, and one artillery regiments, and contains 25,000 troops of the line, with a reserve (redif) of similar strength—together 50,000.—The six orders, therefore, are of themselves 300,000 strong, but in addition to them are, 1st, four detached corps—the Crete, the Tripoli, the Tunis and the Central artillery corps. These corps are far from being organized, and their commanding officers are still at their villas on the Bosphorus.

2d. An army to be levied in Bosnia and Northern Albania; as in these provinces an insurrection caused by the recruiting system has only just been put down, the greater part of those capable of bearing arms have perished, and the rest fled, little can be expected from this force. 3d. 40,000 men which Servia has undertaken to bring into the field. 4th. The army of Egypt, 18,000 men. 5th. The marine corps, 34,000. 6th. The police force, which has a military organization and armament.

Of the six orders only the three first are completely organized; not more than half the cavalry is mounted. The fourth and fifth orders are very deficient, the reserve being without arms, and together they hardly amount to 10,000 men. The 6th, the army of Bagdad, has neither cavalry, artillery, nor reserve, and amounts altogether to about 6,000 men.

This order may be looked upon as quite cut off from the rest by its great distance, defective communications, and more particularly by the Arab tribes of the desert, always more or less in open rebellion: entire battalions go over to the Persians from time to time, with bag and baggage.

Exclusive of the contingents from Bosnia, Servia, and Egypt, the disposable force of Turkey when this reformed plan has been carried out would amount to about 340,000 men; at the present moment it would be difficult to get together 150,000 to 170,000.

According to the Koran, Infidels cannot be admitted into the army; recruits, therefore, can be found only in the Moslem population; among the 15,500,000 of inhabitants of Turkey in Europe only 3,800,000 are Moslems; in Asia and Africa, out of 16,000,000, 12,000,000 are Mussulmans; for the recruiting of the army of 340,000 men, there is therefore a population of 15,000,000, which would be quite sufficient if the system of recruiting were not so ineffective.

A recruiting commission, consisting of several staff and other officers, mollahs, doctors, and subalterns, provided with an Imperial firman, proceeds to the appointed district where lots are to be drawn. The period of service is five years. Those who escape in the lot-drawing one year must draw again every year for four more, and if they escape till the end of the five years they enter the rediff or reserve, which is thus composed of raw militia, which is only exercised one month in a year.

The appointment of the recruits to the different arms of the force is made with regard to the personal fitness of individuals, but at random or by caprice—thus the Albanians, who are good riflemen, are taken for the artillery, fishermen, sailors and peasants, who never sat on a horse, are drawn off to the cavalry.

The drilling and exercising is partly Prussian, grafted on the remains of the former French system. The wretched state of the uniforms and accoutrements, the bayonets kept loose on the muskets that they may ring well on grounding arms, the nonchalance of the men when in rank and file, the impossibility of getting them to stand still or silent, or to "dress," or to march in a straight line, or to do anything in a soldier-like manner, are set forth at great length.

A correspondent of the Daily News says, on the other hand:—

The Divan, although admitting the possibility of a war, yet believing that in the present state of things the best mode of insuring peace was by taking an energetic attitude, resolved on adopting a series of imposing measures. Orders were sent to Achmed Pasha, commanding the Mediterranean squadron, to return immediately with the fleet. He was expected at Constantinople in the course of the present week.

The fleet of the Viceroy of Egypt was also expected in a few days, a courier having been sent to Alexandria with orders. This fleet was to bring a reinforcement of 15,000 men. At the same time orders were given to Omer Pasha, general-in-chief of the army in Roumelia, to descend to Shumla with his corps d'armee, a force of from eighty to one hundred thousand excellent troops, inured to war, and a great number of which took part in the expedition to Bosnia, Kurdistan and Montenegro.

The commander-in-chief has also ordered the immediate formation of two camps, one at Roudjouk and the other at Brussa. These two camps, composed of the redif or reserve, will comprehend 260,000 men, who, joined to the active army of about 250,000 will form a total effective force of more than 500,000 available for the defence of the country.

Besides its ordinary resources, Turkey has at its disposal the reserve chest, recourse to which is only had in extreme cases. This treasury has not been opened since 1827. Its present contents are estimated at 300,000 "purses," or thirty-seven millions francs, at least. The Turks of all classes are decided in their hostility to the Russians; and should war break out, it is the whole nation that will rise against the Muscovite.

RUSSIA.—Russia demands from the Shah of Persia either the immediate repayment of the loan of 50,000,000f., or the cession of the territory of Asterabad, on the shores of the Caspian. The Shah has refused compliance with either demand.

It is said that the Prince Dolgouki, Secretary to the Russian Embassy at Teheran, has given took the part of the insulted dignitary, and addressed a circular to the foreign consuls at Teheran.
