W. B. BARROLL, Agent.
The Adams Express Co.
Pittsburgh, May 5th, 1856. my7

HOLT'S PATENT HAND STAMP.—The subscriber, Agent for the "FRANKLIN HAND STAMP COMPANY," of Boston, Mass., is now prepared to offer to the public a Stamp which, for all practical purposes, surpasses any of the kind heretofore offered to the public. For Railroads, Post-offices, Public Houses, Steamboats, to Professional men for stamping their library, Druggists for printing their own labels, and all Mercantile men for stamping their envelopes, and in fact EVERY MAN in the community who wants a Stamp for marking Linen, Clothing, &c., this is just the thing.
This Stamp is unlike any other in the market, and is not open to objections reasonably urged against other articles of the kind offered to the public, which facts are established on examination—
1st. It is offered for about one-half the usual cost of others.
2d. Being more simple in its construction, it is less liable to get out of order.
3d. It is more compact, easier operated, and more certain of making PERFECT IMPRESSIONS.
The proprietors rely upon the intrinsic merits of the Stamp for its general adoption, feeling confident that its cheapness and superiority combined, over all others, will give it a favorable introduction.
The public are invited to call and see the operation and the variety of styles of electrotype dies.
Orders received for any style or pattern, and the dies electrotyped, of the best material and workmanship.

PITTSBURGH POST.

WEDNESDAY MORNING [illegible]

SPEECH OF JUDGE SHALER,

On taking the Chair as President of the [illegible] Ratification Meeting on Saturday [illegible] ing.

Mr. Shaler, upon being called to the chair, [illegible] returning his thanks to the vast assemblage [illegible] around him in having entrusted him [illegible] duty of calling the meeting to order [illegible] to say:

That the object of the present [illegible] the sanction of popular Democratic will [illegible] form adopted by the recent Cincinnati Convention, and to the nominations for President and Vice [illegible] dent which had been made by that Convention [illegible] such unparalleled unanimity. Before proceeding [illegible] remark, as he should do very briefly, as to the platform and the nominees, he would ask the patience of the meeting whilst he placed himself, in the language of the profession to which he belonged, [illegible] or, in the modern language of [illegible] when they had been abused or abusing another [illegible] wanted to be permitted to make [illegible] tion.

It was notorious, he proceeded to say, to the public, and to his friends that he had been determinedly hostile to every movement that had been made for the last few years for the nomination of Mr. Buchanan for the Presidency. To others it might be sufficient to allege as a motive that his relations with the government at the present time would seem to indicate an indelicacy in his taking an active part in the nomination of any other person than the present incumbent, unless he, in the first place, had signed the office bestowed upon him by the head of the present executive, but although this would certainly have operated to prevent any active interference against Mr. Pierce, it might not be so manifest that it would offer an excuse for vigorous efforts against Mr. Buchanan. Another ground then would be preferative with him, if that alone existed, was the highest estimate he had and continued to have of the great ability and unbending patriotism which had marked the conduct of the government during Mr. Pierce's administration of it. For his own part he said he could not readily bring his mind to the conviction that whilst every act of General Pierce's administration received the unanimous sanction of all the public meetings of the Democratic party wherever held, of all county and State Conventions, it had the full and entire approbation of the recent Convention of statesmen and patriots at Cincinnati, and that that Convention adopted as the platform, the great measures, public, domestic and foreign, which originated in the action of the government, it could appear in any way consistent with sound party policy to give Mr. Pierce the go-by and to nominate another candidate for the Presidency.

In this, however, he submitted to the judgment of the assembled wisdom of the party, as the rule and governing principle of Democratic action. If he may be permitted, he would add that he can but regret the stern necessity that imposed upon the delegation as a duty its unison and the Democratic party to require the retirement of an eminently wise and good man, a sound constitutional lawyer, a sagacious statesman and a patriotic and gallant soldier, before these great practical principles upon which his administration has been based, have been carried out into action.

Independently, however, of all these considerations, my uniform opposition to Mr. Buchanan has been based upon his action which induced the last nomination of Martin Van Buren, and his withdrawal at that time from the Presidential contest, a course which some of his warmest friends at that time thought detrimental to the best interests of Pennsylvania and a fatal policy as regarded himself. Time, however, which is the best test of all human policy, has shown that in this matter his friends were in error, and that he was right; and if anything more was wanting to prove his sagacity, it is the events of the late Convention and his recent nomination.

We are now assembled here to confirm that nomination, and to pledge ourselves to such a course as will insure the success of the Democratic party. It is the principle of that party to be governed by the acts of the delegates when duly appointed, and to this principle I have adhered with scrupulous fidelity; before a nomination by a duly organized delegation all private pique, personal prejudice, or private opinions as to men and measures, must give way. The regard of friendship must be sacrificed to the obligations of official relations must cease. The will of the delegation, constituted as the National delegation has been, unhesitatingly submit, and as far as my poor abilities can avail, I shall cheerfully surrender them to the support of the National Will, in carrying out the nomination of Mr. Buchanan for the Presidency. Considering that a man was to be selected, it would have been difficult to have named a person more suitable, or a candidate more acceptable than Mr. Buchanan. A Pennsylvanian in character, in education, in habits, endeared to us by all those associations that make him the more dear to our friend and neighbor, he has ever been, from the commencement of his political career, a favorite son of Pennsylvania. For more than forty years he has filled political situations of the highest responsibility; in the legislative halls of the good old Commonwealth, her representative in Congress, sustaining her federal relations in the Senate, at home, filling the highest departments in the government abroad, representing in Russia and Great Britain the majesty of the nation, and in whatever position placed adding to his own reputation, increasing the respect due to his country, sustaining her policy, giving credit to her diplomacy, invigorating her prosperity, and extending her glory. It is unnecessary to speak of his talents, for nothing but a high grade of talent could have enabled him so long fill the public eye, and to sustain the severe scrutiny of the public press. He has ever been the eloquent supporter of the Constitution and the laws; the successful assertor of the public rights of the Union; the earnest advocate of the rights of the States; the supporter of the great principles upon which depend the prosperity and glory of our common country. Around him as a leader we can rally with a certainty that the great Democratic platform, by his capacity and patriotism, will be fully sustained. Long versed in our foreign relations he is of all persons the best calculated to bring our foreign difficulties to a peaceful and happy conclusion. Thoroughly grounded in constitutional rights, to him will readily be submitted the solution of those difficulties that now threaten the sanctity of the Union.

In personal appearance he is dignified and imposing, cautious from habit, and having entire control of his temper, he will meet every political exigency with calmness, and apply to it a wisdom earned by study and tested by experience; in manner he is plain, courteous, polite and without ostentation; simple in his habits, republican in his intercourse with his fellow citizens; a Democrat without guile, and statesman without reproach; his private character is as unsullied as his public reputation has been honorable to himself, and glorious to his country. Such is James Buchanan, the nominee of the Convention, the Democratic candidate for the Presidency. Shall we not support this distinguished son of Pennsylvania with an unanimity such as has never yet fallen to the lot of any other man than the immortal friend, General Jackson.

Equally worthy of our confidence and of our best efforts will be found Mr. Breckenridge, of Kentucky. No better evidence of his talents can be required than that in a district so capable of appreciating talent, and which has ever been represented by men the most distinguished in the nation, in the district of Henry Clay, a district essentially Whig, and in opposition to some of the most eminent men in that party, Mr. Breckenridge has been uniformly triumphant.

His course in Congress was distinguished by integrity, eloquence and profound popular discrimination. No man in his native State is more prominent, and no man more influential with the South, or better calculated to operate upon the energies that concentrate the votes of the Southern States.

Having taken a glance at the men, [illegible] on the platform we are invited to support, and which is now in part made for the direction and principle of the Democratic party.

I allude here particularly to the resolution added to the Baltimore Platform, and now for the first time enunciated in a specific form as the object of [illegible] support.

Some of these relate to our foreign, some to our domestic policy, and some of them have a commingling of both.

According to the views I entertain as to what constitutes the true glory of a nation, the principles adopted by the most renowned republics of ancient days in their military views, ought to be carried out by us in all our national designs.

With the Roman Republic the principle was adopted and uniformly carried out, that where ever the Roman Eagle had once been planted, there was Rome. No matter what misfortune befel the legion—no matter what distress befel Rome by war, the Republic never surrendered the spot where its legions had encamped, and until conquered gave but the peaceable possession of it, she never granted any of [illegible]
