Revolt Among the Irish.

CAMP WINFIELD SCOTT, }
NEAR YORKTOWN, April 24. }

A deserter, a young and intelligent lad, belonging to an Alabama regiment, came within our lines this morning. A good deal of his information is very important, but improper for publication. He confirms the statements of the deserting rebel colonel and lieutenant who came within our lines on our left, regarding the refusal of an Irish Brigade among the rebel troops to continue in arms against the Union army. The refusal originated from their seeing an Irish regimental flag on our side. The sight of the shamrock and harp of Erin, around which the gallant sons of the Emerald Isle have for centuries rallied with such devotional unity, revived the old feeling of brotherhood. They said they would not fight, and they will not. As described to me by the young Alabamian, the scene of the surrender of their arms was one of grand impressiveness—one of those sublime scenes in national history of rarest exhibition, and only called out by that deepest intensity of internal struggle wherein are revealed the highest and noblest traits of humanity—an exhibition of moral grandeur and lofty dignity poets and painters grasp as their fittest themes, but essay in vain to fittingly memorialize either in words of immortal song or on the unfading canvass. The entire act, the first firm resolve, its announcement, giving up their arms and colors, and facing the penalty of death that might be meted out to them, show a spirit of martyrdom and earnest self-sacrifice that savors of the wild war legends of Cromwell's time. The entire brigade is still under arrest. Among the Irish regiments on our side there is great rejoicing and enthusiasm at the course taken by the rebel brigade. If it is possible to increase the fighting furor that existed among them previous to this event, it is increased now. They have a new stimulus to fight for—the rescue of their countrymen now held prisoners on the other side of the enemy's intrenchments.

President Lincoln Visits a French Vessel

WASHINGTON, April 26.—The President's visit to the French frigate Gassendi this afternoon was an event of [illegible] importance. It was the first time a President ever went on board a French vessel of war, and the first French vessel of war that ever came to Washington. The President was received with all the honors paid a crowned head, and being the same as usually shown the Emperor of France. The yards were manned, [illegible] the American national ensign at the main, and French flag at the mizzen and peak. The national salute was fired on the President's arrival and again on his departure. [illegible] Reynaud received him at the foot of the ladder and the seamen seven times shouted Vive le President on his arriving and leaving. Capt. Gautier entertained him hospitably in his cabin and presented the officers of the ship. The President was attended at the landing by a full guard of marines and the band who played the national airs. Capt. Dahlgren and the other officers of the Yard received him in a body. The President was accompanied on board by the Secretary of State and Captain Dahlgren. The French Minister was on board to receive him and present his countrymen. The occasion was a gratifying one to the President and the affair passed off to the mutual satisfaction and was deemed a happy augury for the future amicable relations of the two countries.

The New Iron-clad Frigate.

The work is progressing so rapidly on the new iron-clad frigate at Philadelphia that it is supposed she will be ready for launching by the first of [illegible]. The four and a half inch [illegible] which are to be below the [illegible] are nearly all in place, and [illegible] are to be above the water-line [illegible] on after she is launched. [illegible] is nearly finished. It [illegible] three inches of wood and [illegible] of iron. She will be bark-rigged and her spars so arranged that [illegible] action they all come down for [illegible]. The ship yard is still visited by a large number of persons, most of whom are compelled to take a view of the frigate from the fence surrounding the place. This has been found necessary to prevent accident and annoyance to the workmen.—Pitts. [illegible]

[illegible] ALTERED NOTE.—Our dealers should be careful about taking [illegible] dollar notes on the Corn Exchange Bank of Philadelphia. Counterfeits of this denomination have [illegible] but, as yet, are not in extensive circulation. They are alleged [illegible] the same bank. The vignette is an oval portrait of Gen. Scott; [illegible] on each upper corner; a [illegible] with sheaf and sickle on the [illegible] corner and a female with a basket of fruit on the lower right.
