A fair trial will convince the most skeptical of its curative powers. It effectually cleanses the nasal passages of Catarrhal virus, causing healthy secretions, allays inflammation and irritation, protects the membranal linings of the head from additional colds, completely heals the sores and restores the sense of taste and smell. Beneficial results are realized by a few applications. A thorough treatment as directed will cure Catarrh. As a household remedy for cold in the head it is unequaled. The Balm is easy to use and agreeable. Sold by druggists at 50 cents. On receipt of 50 cents will mail a package. Send for circular with full information.

WHAT IS THE GAIN?

THOMAS S. COLLYER.

What is the gain?
If one should run a noble race,
And at the last, with weary pace,
Win to the goal, and find his years
A harvest field of waste and tears,
Of turmoil and of buried trust,
Rich with dead hopes and bitter dust,
And strife and sneer and ceaseless pain,
What is the gain?

What is the gain?
When, having reached a sunlit height,
Through barrer sweeps of gloomful night,
Hoping to see beyond the crest
Fair lands of beauty and of rest,
There lies before, stretched far away
Unto the confines of the day
A desolate and shadeless plain,
What is the gain?

What is the gain?
To sail for months of cold and toil
Across wide seas, where winds recoil,
Only to gather strength and roar
A louder challenge than before,
And find, when through fogs thick and dun
The rocky coast at last is won,
No haven from the storm-vexed main,
What is the gain!

What is the gain?
The race is won, we see the light,
We conquer where the storm-winds fight;
We show the way to these who wait
With faint hearts by the walls of fate;
Our banners flutter in the van
Of battles fought for thought and man,
And ignorance and darkness wane,
This is the gain.

HIS OWN DAUGHTER.

"Dear mother, it is the best thing after all that could have happened; it is so much better than anything I dared to hope for. Because, if I had not fallen and sprained my ankle, I would not have lost my place in the store, and if it had not been for losing my place there I would never have gone all over the city hunting another situation, and if I had not been in so many places, and—if starvation hadn't stared us in the face, I would never have done so deperate a thing, and we would still be trying to keep body and soul together on the poorly-paid, health-destroying labor—a poor saleswoman's wages."

"Tell me all about it, dear," said Mrs Smith, dropping her thin, tired hands on the work over which she had bent wearily all day.

"First let me put this endless sewing away, mother. These poor, dear hands may rest a little now, for I am going to get $10 a week, and will only be away from you four or five hours each day. I shall have time for ever so much sewing besides, and you can just rest and grow strong once more. I received my first week's wages in advance. See here—" and she cut the cord that bound a large bundle, and out on the table rolled several smaller parcels. "I brought the money home in a shape we could appreciate best; at least—all there was left after paying the baker. Now, mother dear, I am going to be extravagant and make an extra good cup of tea."

"But Nellie, my child, you have not told me—"

"I know, mother," broke in the blithe voice, "but you see, I haven't forgotten that it is nearly noon, and we have had no breakfast yet. There now—" giving the fire a vigorous poke that set the tea to steeping, "you see, mother, I was just discouraged. I had been to every store, millinery and dressmaking establishment that I knew of, and received the same answer: 'No more help needed,' to all my inquiries, and, as I said, I was desperate. Just as I turned the corner of Bleeker street I saw a man being helped out of his carriage; such a splendid carriage, mother. He was not a very old man, but looked as though he was almost gone with consumption. I went straight up to him, hardly realizing what I was doing, and asked him if he knew where I could get employment of some kind. At first he looked angry, as though he thought my impudence unbearable, but when he saw my face he stood still and looked at me as though he had seen a ghost. After a moment he said,

"'Yes, I will engage you to come to my house every day at 10 o'clock and read or write for me, as I desire, until 3. I will pay you $10 a week for your services.'"

"Then he handed me his card, on which I read, 'Hon. C. Hewitt, No. 42 Leonard street,' and I remembered that one of the girls had once pointed out his beautiful residence to me.

"'If the situation and terms are satisfactory, you will please accept one week's wages in advance, and come to-morrow at 10 o'clock.'"

"And he held the money which I was only too glad to take."

"Were you not a little hasty, daughter?" asked the mother, anxiously. "You know nothing of this man."

"I know this, mother, that we are starving, and that money was our only salvation; besides, it all occurred so quickly that I hardly realized what had happened. Somehow it seemed as though some over-ruling providence was guiding me in spite of myself."

"God grant that it may be so," said her mother.

And now, while Nellie and her mother are enjoying their dinner, let us cast a hasty look into Mrs. Smith's past life. Her parents having died when she was young, her childhood and girlhood were passed in the dreary monotony of her aunt's house—a home which was grudgingly offered her, where food, clothing and education were dealt out to her, but where never a word or look of love was bestowed upon her.

What wonder that, when Claude Smith, one of her aunt's summer boarders, became interested in the girl's pretty and shy sweet face, and told her the old, old story, her yearning heart responded with a passionate love? Her aunt, being only too glad to have the girl's support fall on other shoulders, consented to the union, and one evening there was a quiet wedding at the little cottage.

Then followed weeks of happiness for the girl whose life had been so lonley, until one evening her husband came to her with a troubled look and told her that his only relative, an uncle in England, was very sick and had sent for him to come immediately, and, taking his young wife in his arms he soothed her with fond words, saying:

"I dare not take you with me, darling. Uncle George was very angry when my mother married an American with such a plebian name. Of all low names, Smith he claims stands at the very bottom. Uncle George never forgave my mother; but when both my parents died, leaving me alone, he appointed a guardian for me kept well supplied with funds, and now that he is dying I must go to him; but I will return as soon as possible to my little wife."

And so he left her, with plenty of money but with an aching heart, and she had never seen him since.

Troubles had seemed to multiply after that. A contagious disease broke out in their town, and carried off whole families. Her aunt fell a victim, but she escaped and came to the city, hoping to find employment by which to support herself. She had a small sum of money left, with which she purchased a little cottage, and here Nellie was born.

The roses bloomed once more on Nellie's cheeks, and her step grew light as the weeks advanced. She liked her employment, and, above all, she liked her employer. Many substantial evidences of his kindness had found their way to the little cottage, and many an extra dollar had found its way to Nellie's pocket.

As his face grew thinner and his step slower, he seemed to turn to the young girl for sympathy, and the sound of her sweet voice, and the touch of her cool hand, had power to sooth him to rest when all else had failed. He often watched her as she moved about the room, in her bright, cheerful way, with a strange, wistful look in his fading eyes.

One morning, as she took her seat by his couch, he laid his thin, transparent hand on her own, saying as he did so.

"I feel that I have but a few more hours of life and I wish to talk to you," and he smiled almost sadly as he met her startled glance.

"Yes," he continued slowly, "I shall soon be gone, and there will be no one to truly mourn for me, unless it be the little girl I have taken such an unaccountable interest in. You will miss me, Nellie!"

For answer she bowed her head over her clasped hands and wept.

He waited a few moments, then taking one little palm in his hands and caressing it tenderly, said:

"No doubt you have often wondered that I, a perfect stranger, should have given you employment without question or reference. I can hardly tell why I did so, myself. Perhaps it was a look on that pitiful young face so like a dear face I used to love. I have carried the memory of that face all through life. I had only been married a few weeks when I was summoned to England, and when I returned I found the house where I had left my dear one deserted, and was told that she was dead.

"My uncle, at his death, left me his property, providing that I would take his name, but oh! it has been a long, sad life without my darling.

"I have taken a strange interest in you, and my heart seems to cling to you in my last hours. I have taken care of your future, dear, and there is neither wife nor child, brother or sister to question the right of the will I have made in your behalf. Somehow, since I have carried out my intentions respecting you I feel so peaceful; as though there is nothing left undone, and I am ready to go."

He was interrupted by a fit of coughing which lasted so long that Nellie was frightened. After she had laid him back on his pillow she saw his lips move, but the words were so low that she had to bend over him to hear them.

"When I am gone, Nellie, open this little ebony casket. Inside you will find my wife's picture. You may look at it, but I want it buried with me."

He lay back on his pillow and closed his eyes wearily. A strange calm stole o'er his features and an icy chill crept into the hands clasping hers—a chill that sent a thrill of terror to her heart. She bent over him and spoke his name, oh! so tenderly—but he heard not the young voice. He had passed forever beyond its reach.

The next day, as he lay in his coffin, Nellie opened the little casket and took out the picture he had treasured. Going to the window, she opened the case, looked upon the sweet, girlish face smiling up at her. One moment, then a quick, gasping cry escaped her lips, and she fell into the arms of an attendant. The face of her dead friend's lost wife was the face of her mother.

Answer This.

Is there a person living who ever saw a case of ague, biliousness, nervousness, or neuralgia, or any disease of the stomach, liver, or kidneys that Hop Bitters will not cure?

Complicated Diseases.
A prominent gentleman in Cerro Gordo County, Iowa, writes us that he finds Kidney-Wort to be the best remedy he ever knew for a complication of diseases. It is the specific action which it has on the liver kidneys and bowels, which gives it such curative power, and it is the thousands of cures which it is performing which gives it its great celebrity. Liquid, (very concentrated) or dry, both act efficiently.—N. E. Journal and Courier.
