Proved Innocent Too Late.

Circumstantial Evidence.

There was a trial and execution in Dublin, more than a century since, which excited great interest. It was that of a surgeon, well-known in society, and esteemed for his amiable character, and remarkable for his humanity to the poor; he lived in a retired street. It happened one evening that the milk-woman found the street door ajar—and not being answered when she knocked at it, she made her way to the kitchen. She had no sooner entered it, than uttering a piercing shriek, she called loudly for help. The passers-by and persons from the neighboring houses were soon on the spot, and the kitchen was crowded in a short time. A sad spectacle presented itself. The young woman, who was servant to the surgeon, was lying dead on the flags, while her dress was stained with the blood which had issued from a wound in the side. In looking about the floor a surgical instrument was found, which also was stained with blood. A medical man, who was present, ascertained that it was the instrument which had inflicted the death-wound. On a further search, a shirt, saturated with blood, was found huddled up in the coal-hole; it was marked with the initials of the surgeon's name.

He was immediately seized, and, though protesting his innocence, he was evidently under considerable agitation. The silent witnesses which were brought against him were thought sufficient to prove his guilt, and all attempts to account for their having been found near the unfortunate girl were scouted in the cross-examination.

A living witness was also produced in Court, an old lady, who deposed that she lived in the house directly facing that where the surgeon resided; that her drawing-room window commanded a view of his premises, and that it was customary with her to watch his movements; she deposed that she had not taken her eyes off his house all that day on which the murder was perpetrated, that no one had left or entered his house that day but himself; that he went home at about four o'clock, his usual hour of returning; and that on knocking at the door it was opened by the servant, who, to the best of her belief, shut it fast when her master went in; that she saw him three or four times pass the windows of his sitting-room; that the last time she saw him was about an hour and a half before the murder; that she observed him look down both sides of the street, and then shut down the window; he held something in his hand, which she thinks may have been a surgical instrument; but this she would not positively swear.

In summing up the evidence, the horror which the prisoner had betrayed when looking on the body of his murdered servant was eloquently dwelt on as a crowning proof of guilt. The defence was weak and negre—a bare denial of the crime being its chief substance. A thrill of horror prevaded the Court. The jury retired—a brief space sufficed for deliberation—they returned with a verdict of "guilty." The Judge having donned his black cap, exhorted the prisoner on the heinousness of his crime, and pronounced the fatal sentence.

It is said that the condemned showed much fortitude throughout, and persisted to the last in asserting his innocence. He was brought to the place of execution amid a vast concourse and the execrations of the people. We were told by an old gentleman that his father remembered having been held up in his nurse's arms to see the procession to the place of execution. He was often spoken of in the social circle as one who had been held in much estimation. His untimely end was lamented, but there were few who believed it undeserved.

It was after the lapse of several years that some one who had emigrated to America returned. He was ill, and troubled in mind; something lay heavy on his heart and disturbed his conscience; he made his confession to his priest; he had been "the sweetheart" of the murdered girl; she had let him in by the back way, early in the evening, to take tea with her. As they sat side by side, he asked her for a kiss, which he would have snatched, when she denied him; she took up her master's surgical instrument, which she had to clean, and which lay on the table beside her, and she pointed it toward him jestingly; in a struggle, she fell on it, and it pierced her side; he snatched the shirt, which she had in her lap to mend, and staunched the blood which was flowing with it; but life soon ebbed away, and he saw the girl that he loved—who had been laughing and talking with him but a few minutes before—lying dead beside him; his agony only gave way to the instinct of self-preservation, when he thought he heard the sound of approaching footsteps; he thrust the blood-stained shirt into the coal-hole, and shutting the hall door, he concealed himself behind it, and when the crowd had collected on hearing the alarm, he mingled with it, and then passed into the street, and on to the quay, and getting on board an American ship, he sailed in a few hours. When he learned that the surgeon's life had been forfeited he was overwhelmed with anguish. The only reparation in his power was to clear his character from the dreadful imputation; but thought he felt a relief in this act of justice, yet it could not undo the injury inflicted.
