A DAUGHTER of TWO WORLDS

A Story of New York Life

He mounted to his apartment, in which he had lived the solitary life of a bachelor these many years, and locked the door. Then very carefully he drew down every blind. After that he took off his suit, so old that it was familiar to all his friends; he removed every garment in which he had been seen that afternoon; even the socks and shoes. These he made into a flat, compact parcel. Then he dressed very lightly in quite other clothes, omitting coat and vest, and slipped on a long raincoat—for fortunate for his purpose a drizzling rain had begun to fall. And then, last of all, he shoved an automatic into his hip pocket. This last act he did somewhat awkwardly, for this was the first time in over fifteen years that Black Jerry had had arms upon his person.

With the flat parcel under his raincoat he went down into the street. Since he were the black derby he had worn all day, none who knew him and saw him would suspect that he was dressed in other than the blue serge which was his invariable wear. First he went to a drugstore in which there was a public telephone in a booth. He was certain both Kenneth and Slim Jackson were then in the city, and he was almost certain where each was to be located at this hour; but this knowledge he verified by the discreet use of the telephone.

Black Jerry had these many, many years been law-abiding, at least in the technical sense of the laws and as he understood them; but he had many friends in what is called the underworld, who were loyal to him and who had profound reason to be.

He made his way to a pawnshop; it was an indubitable pawnshop—but also it was other things.

"Joe," he said to the old proprietor when they were safe in the latter's back room, "I want you to send out one message and two telegrams for me. It's up to you to get 'em out so they can never afterward be traced as being anything except perfectly straight. It's part of your business to know how to do such thing—so I'm not going to give you any advice. Take a pencil and I'll read the stuff off to you."

The first was a message to the captain of the Myra, the Harrisons' yacht, which Jerry knew to be now at anchor in the Hudson river. From the vindictive Doris Dorraine he had learned that there were frequent and very private sessions of merriment on board the Myra of nights—and that prior to such events the captain and all the crew were given shore leave. So this first message was an order, in Kenneth's name, to the captain for all on board to absent themselves at once.

The second message was a telegram to Slim Jackson, so worded as to be of such veiled importance as would make certain Slim's obedience, asking him to be on the Myra at nine that evening. This telegram bore Kenneth's name.

The third message was to Kenneth, bore the signature of Slim Jackson and was in substance a duplicate of the other. Jerry had made the hour as early as nine so that there would hardly be time for the two to communicate with each other. He believed, moreover, that the veiled importance he had put into the messages wou'd bring about the unsuspecting compliance of both men.

This task attended to (and he knew the business would be done well) Jerry went out of the pawnshop.

Three quarters of an hour later he was uptown on the opposite side of the city, close to the Manhattan Yacht Club. He waited in the darkness, for he knew that the men from the Myra would land here.

He had not been there more than five minutes when a boat drew up alongside the end of the club float nearest him, and four figures stepped out, made the boat fast and disappeared. He was sure that these were the Myra's crew, but he waited until the stern of the boat swung around toward him; the light from the clubhouse was dim, but he could clearly spell out M-Y-R-A. He now had no doubt, and he carefully pushed out from shore in a small rowboat he had commandeered.

Ten minutes later he stepped on the deck of the Myra, and made fast his boat to the ladder. He made a cautious and swift round of the yacht. Not a soul was on board—just as he had counted. Returning, he untied the painter of his stolen boat and cast it loose upon the outgoing tide; then he took off his shoes and dropped them overboard.

Another ten minutes passed, and then a rowboat softly bumped the Myra's side, and Slim Jackson stepped upon the deck. At once the boat pushed off and slipped back toward the shore.

Presently another boat bumped the yacht's side, discharged a passenger, and made back for the shore. The instant Kenneth went down the companionway, Black Jerry threw his derby half far out into the water, and slipped off his raincoat and tossed it likewise over into the tide, which might carry it a dozen miles—perhaps a hundred—from where the Myra lay at anchor. He now stood in shirt and belted trousers. While he had waited he had drawn on a pair of delicately thin rubber gloves such as surgeons wear; they had no finger prints down at Police Headquarters, and he wished to leave behind no slightest proof that he had been on board that night.

"Hello, Kenneth," he heard Slim drawl as Kenneth threw off his raincoat. "That was a queer stunt, Jennie's giving herself up today."

"It certainly was," replied Kenneth. "I thought she was out of the country."

"Do you think it may get us in bad? I suppose you wanted a business talk—that's why you sent that telegram to me?"

"What are you talking about?" exclaimed Kenneth. "I never sent any telegram to you. I'm here because of one you sent me."

"One I sent you?" Slim sprang to his feet. "I never sent you one—you never sent me one—Kenneth, there's something crooked here!"

"There sure is," agreed Jerry's heavy voice as he stepped through the cabin doorway.

The two men whirled about upon him. "Black Jerry!" ejaculated Slim Jackson.

Black Jerry closed the cabin door, and bareheaded, open-throated, huge and menacing, he stood motionless glaring at the two men. They had drawn back a pace at his sudden entrance.

"Well, Jerry, what's the great idea?" Slim tried to speak with his usual nonchalance.

Jerry's emotions did not allow him to answer at once. When he spoke, he spoke with husky savageness. "The great idea is that us three have something to talk over. And first thing, you two guys are to sit down at that table."

The two men did not at once comply. "Sit down!" growled Jerry, advancing toward them. At his glowering approach, Slim Jackson whipped from somewhere within his perfect evening dress a small automatic. But before he could level it, Black Jerry had sprung, for Jerry had foreseen the possibility of this action. Jerry's great hand clutched Slim's wrist, there was an instant's struggle, then the automatic was Jerry's, and as he sent Slim crashing across the cabin he turned on Kenneth.

"Put up your hands—you sweet son-in-law of mine!" he commanded with his guttural fierceness.

Very pale, Kenneth put them up. Jerry slapped his pockets, and drew out another pistol.

"So—you were expecting trouble," Jerry commented. "Sit down, both of you."

Black Jerry took a chair across the table from the two, and fixed them with his blazing eyes.

"Now we're going to have a little talk, us three—quiet; out here no one can hear us or disturb us. And what we're going to talk about is this: You two got my Jennie into this mess—it's up to you to get her out clean."

"But I haven't done anything, Jerry, to get Jennie into a mess," objected Slim.
