THE HOUSE OF MOHUN

WHO'S WHO IN THE STORY

CHERRY MOHUN, a typical girl of the period, inclined to Bolshevism and wholly independent in her bearing and opinions, young at heart, she has not been spoiled by the adulation that follows her beauty and prospective wealth. She is irritated yet somehow fascinated by DAVID SANGREE, a young American citizen who has followed war service in diplomacy into the exposition in line with his scientific bent. Scholarly but not an intellectual prig, he is perplexed and interested at the change in manners and customs on his return to his native land, particularly among the younger set, to whom Cherry is irresistibly interesting to him. He is not wealthy, but has modest funds, invested with

MR. MOHUN, Cherry's father, a silent, forceful, typical American business man, who from a small start in the provinces has become a financial leader in New York. Absorption in business prevents attention to his son and daughter, who are left to the slack care of MRS. MOHUN, still a handsome and attractive woman in middle age, with some of the impulses of youth and a good deal of the self-centeredness of the younger generation. She has pulled up her family to high social position.

BOB MOHUN, the son, one of the flapperish reckless lads of the day.

GEORGE LYCETT, an elderly friend of Sangree and the Mohuns, who changes and philosophizes over contemporary free-and-easy ways.

"My dear child—" he began.

"Come," she said. "There's the music again. I've got to dance—to dance."

They reached the dancing floor and had taken only a few steps when somebody seized her from him, almost by main force. He gasped and sought the alcove by the windows again.

He hadn't intended staying for supper, but these few interludes had piqued his interest. So this was Cherry's soldier friend, about whom she had been so reticent. The war had been a great leveler and it hadn't been the fashion to be snobbish. But the prejudices of Eugenia Armitage were informing. Sangree wasn't sure from the brief glimpse he had had of the fellow that he didn't agree with her. For all his fine shoulders Bruce Cowan gave an impression of being fashioned of a baser clay than most of those young people Sangree saw about him, for, after all, they seemed rather a wholesome lot, exhibiting only errors of taste rather than of morals.

But he made up his mind to stay for supper on the odd chance of a chat with Cherry and improved the moments that remained by seeking the men's dressing room and a cigarette. He found the stairway blocked by couples en tete-a-tete, many of them sharing cigarettes, and at the top of the stairway, where he took the wrong turn, he stumbled into a dark corner where there was a window seat out of sight of the others. There a girl and a boy were embracing each other with the innocent abstraction of two turtle doves.

"She hasn't a very strong head. The champagne—she's so silly. * * * I hope nobody noticed."

"Heicho!" thought Rameses. "By force of habit. They've forgotten their feet aren't dancing."

But even in the dark he had seen the girl was Cherry's friend, Gladys Towne. He didn't remember having met the boy. After all—a kiss—what was it? A trifle, an airy nothing, a mere symbol of affection. Perhaps the boy and girl cared for each other, he hoped so. It was such a pretty tableau. But at Sangree's sudden appearance the turtle doves had spread their wings and fluttered, rather startled, down the stairs to the ballroom.

In the dressing room he found several youths that he had met. There was Scotch, rye and club soda on a table and the conversation was not of Shakespeare and the musical glasses.

"She's perf' lil pippin," one of them was saying over and over in a kind of amiable soliloquy as he reclined in a Morris chair. "Pity she ain't in this set. She'd show 'em. Think I'll marry her, jus' same. Damndon't.

"Oh, shut up, Bob. Nobody cares about your illicit affections."

"'licit! Who says 'licit?' said the other glancing around heavily. "Don't I tell you I love—hic—hic—I know wha's matter 'th you, Harry," he muttered as the other boy laughed. "You're jus' fuller 'n goat. Tha's wha's matter."

His voice subsided into a mumble and presently he slept. But as the boy's head fell back Sangree discovered that the youthful inebriate was Cherry Mohun's brother Bob.

At supper, which was served in the dining room, hall and conservatory, Cherry espied her friend wandering absently about and made him sit at her table with Eugenia Armitage, Phoebe Macklin, Dicky Wilberforce, John Chichester and Bruce Cowan.

He found the food more substantial than the conversation, which, like the wine, sparkled in tiny bubbles and burst into nothing. But every one seemed to be having a good time and soon the visitor found himself falling under the spell of their gayety and irresponsibility which for the moment had rescued him from his Cave of Adullam. It was Cherry Mohun's friend, Bruce Cowan, whose laughter first was loudest, for Dicky became quieter the more he drank, and John Chichester, as every exhilarated over champagne. Cherry's eyes glowed, Phoebe grew sentimental and 'Genie's tongue mocked, but they were all decorous, and when the fourth bottle came Cherry sent it away. It seemed that in this particular Olympus the gods had their limitations.

But at some of the other tables near by the fun was now furious. Sylvia Wetherill and Harold Galbraith were trying an imitation of pas de deux amid applause and Teddy Waring did a juggling act for which he was famous. Too much encouragement, however, resulted in his ruin, for at the last both he and the caterer's crockery ended in disaster upon the floor.

The crash was rather startling and people rose and made their way toward the ballroom as though with an awakening sense of responsibility to the real business of the hour, which was to dance—to one step, to side step, to glide, to toddle until their weary feet would no longer hold them. Sangree waited for one more turn with Cherry, and, while he waited, the great event of the evening took place. He [illegible] the opportunity he already had [illegible] wistaria blossoms among which a hundred canaries in their cages warbled and twittered excitedly, the huge cluster of American Beauty roses, the orchestra of thirty pieces, the best exponents of the art of syncopation that sophisticated New York could offer.

But now, as the handclapping for the last measure had ceased, the trap-drummer had finished the inevitable "tum-te-tum-tum-tum—tum," and the trombone had given its cynical laugh, an expectant hush fell upon the dancers. For the velvet curtains at the end of the room flew open and, with a fanfare from the brass instruments, a Pierrot leaped forth. He was recognized at once—the great Kadnikov of the Russian Ballet—as with gesture and dance he cleared the floor, while the orchestra, showing that it was capable of music of a better sort, launched itself gayly into the ballet music of "Coppelia." Another gesture from Kadnikov, the curtains parted again and a great flowerpot rolled into the room, pulled by a group of girls in tights, dressed as the pages of some sort of Fairy Court. In the flowerpot was a huge rosebud of papier mache, which, at a gesture and prayer in pantomime from Pierrot, slowly opened its petals, revealing at last a dainty Pierrette peeping out.

At a signal she sprang forth. It was the ballerina, Balkova the Wonderful. She met Pierrot. They kissed. He grew ardent. She repulsed him. She fled. He followed—all to the cadence of the music. Here was the very apotheosis of the dance, grace and joy in poetry, music and color. Pierrot caught his quarry at last and then the fairy pages emerged again and joined in the ballet under the shifting colors of calcium light which flowed over the dancers like a veil of quicksilver. To David Sangree it was all very beautiful and 'Genie by his side gave a gasp of dismay as the ballroom fell into a sudden darkness. When the lights went on the dancers had disappeared.

Applause, a repetition of the ballet, at the end of which the trombone laughed derisively again and in a moment the orchestra swept into a popular tune which brought the real actors in this human comedy upon the floor. Balkova was great, but who could resist the lilt of such a "toddle"?

Sangree turned away. After poetry, this was doggerel. Cherry seemed to have disappeared, but he found her later coming down the stair, a thoughtful expression on her face.

"I've been looking everywhere for you—to thank you and to say good night," he said.

"Are you going?" she asked listlessly. "I'm sorry."

"Is something bothering you?" he asked.

"No. Yes. That is—oh—something terrible has happened, Dr. Sangree—"

"Anything that I—?" he began.

"No. Nothing. It's just Vi—and I'm so awfully fond of her——"

"You mean that she's——"

"Just ill. She hasn't a very strong head. The champagne—she's so silly * * * I hope nobody noticed."

"Can't I take her home—?"

"No. No. That would be fearful. The Everards are terribly strict. 'Genie's going to keep her here. Please don't say anything. I know you won't. Good night."

Among David Sangree's social assets was an important club, the Olympian. He had kept up his membership during the years of his wanderings, more in deference to the wishes of his dead father, than to any desire to avail himself of its privileges. He had been elected in his twentyfirst year, in accordance with the custom, but had rarely been inside its doors, until his recent return to New York. Recluse and student by habit, his social intercourse had been confined to those persons with whom his studies had thrown him.

It was, therefore, with a feeling of [illegible] to be launched into the little backwash of the literary sea where works such as his found their haven. Three—perhaps four—hundred people would read it and give him much intimate approbation, but the newspapers and literary review would dismiss it with a line and the great American public would continue in blissful ignorance that it, or he, even existed.

But, the proofs out of his hands, Sangree formed the habit of dropping in at the Olympian in the late afternoon to read the papers or to chat with George Lycett, who still continued, after a fashion, to be his mentor and guide. He found, too, that a number of the young men whom he had met during the season were to be found there in the billiard or card rooms, bemoaning their fate at having been born in a country which could see fit to deprive its citizens of their rights as individuals, which meant that they were thirsty and didn't care who knew it. The attendance at the Olympian, as at other clubs, had been much diminished by prohibition, and the large rooms which had formerly hummed with the sounds of pleasant voices were now almost deserted, except at the luncheon hour. Its members had engagements elsewhere. Perhaps they went home to their wives and families. But they did not make of "the Morgue," as they called it, a meeting place or a refuge from "the cares that infest the day."

And, indeed, the lofty ceilings of the huge rooms, designed for dignity and beauty, seemed to absorb all sounds of conversation, and footsteps upon the marble hallway gave forth a vault-like echo, which made the name the younger men had given the place seem most fitting. The silence of the reading room was interrupted only by the quiet snores of respectable, if weary, old gentlemen, who had dozed over their newspapers. In a way, the atmosphere of the place suited Sangree admirably. He found some profit in the library, where at odd moments, for diversion, he browsed over Ferrero or plowed through Hesiod, or when in a philosophic mood dipped into the "maxims" of Publius Syrus. There, sometimes, Mr. Lycett found him and led him down, against his will, into the company of his fellow man, even if he were only Harold Galbraith or Teddy Waring. This, in accordance with the desire, so aptly expressed by Cherry Mohun, that the seeker after truth should become David Sangree instead of Rameses the Second.
