Agricultural.

Hints About Work.

Building.—Timber may be gotten out, frames cut and fitted, for new buildings, and alterations of the interior of houses or other structures may go on as well in winter as at any time, labor being cheaper, and contractors desirous of having work for the men.

Frost and Snow.—Look to the protection of water pipes, the root cellar, or roots wherever stored against frost. Snow affords excellent defence against hard freezing. Never delay path-making after the snowing is fairly over. In case of a very heavy fall of snow, endangering flat roofs, etc., clear it off immediately, lest, rain falling, the weight be greatly increased, and serious damage occur.

Icy Paths are dangerous to both men and animals. Coal ashes are usually the most convenient article with which to cover icy spots, but they are dirty about the house. Sand is better, sawdust still more cleanly, and salt seldom advisable.

Horses.—Look frequently to the caulks, and never let them go smooth-shod, the strains and sprains occasioned by going over slippery ground being the frequent causes of spavins, splints, and other lamenesses. Horses not exposed to draughts of air, do not need blanketing in the stable, except when they are warm from recent exercise. Unblanketed, they will eat a little more, but have better health.

Cows—Dry cows coming in in the spring, need just as good feed and care as if in full milk, but the food need not be so fattening. Roots are a very useful addition to their feed, and they should have the liberty of a sunny yard several hours a day.

Milch cows require, of course, food and treatment calculated to stimulate milk production.

Young Cattle.—Spring calves are making their most rapid growth just when cold weather comes on. They should receive very much the treatment of older stock, and not be wintered in the yards and open sheds.—They will eat less, and grow faster for warm stabling; besides, their manure will be worth more. Their growth will surprise one accustomed to winter such stock in the old way.

Beeves.—Oil-cake will be extensively substituted for corn meal as feed for fattening stock this winter. Variety is desirable in feeding, salt is essential, regular watering indispensable, and the highest degree of comfort most profitable. Great quiet and warm stables, with good ventilation, and frequent and regular feeding, are the circumstances most favorable to rapid healthy fatting.

Sheep.—Stock sheep ought to have the range of good-sized yards, and the shelter of warm sheds, to which they have free access during the day, and in which they are confined at night. Ewes will do much better for a little grain daily, and their lambs will be stronger. Fatting sheep should be pushed forward during this month to be ready for a rise in the market. Feed meal with care that all get their allowance; those that get too much may suffer for it.

Swine.—Give brood sows good plain feed, not too fattening. If they have made their growth, (and old sows are the best breeders,) they do best on really poor fare. They will even winter well on clover hay, with a few nubbins now and then, if they have good warm pens and plenty of litter.

Fowls should receive especial care towards the latter part of the month. With extra feeding, occasional feeds of chopped meat, or scrap-cake, they will soon lay freely, and if one has warm quarters for young chickens, (a hot-bed frame, with the sashes, of course, is excellent, and so is a cold grapery) it may be well to set hens as early as the last of this month.—By employing cocks of the large breeds, Cochins, Bramahs, or Dorkings, large broilers may be ready for market by the time asparagus is fit to cut. It is not worth while, in raising chickens for stock or for autumn and winter marketing, to have them hatch before the middle of April.

Draining may be done, should the frost leave the ground, or be found to be not very deep.

Fencing Material should be got out, and hauled to the lines where it is to be used, for fences are usually best built when it is very heavy wheeling.

Fire-Wood.—"In peace prepare for war." Though the whole year is before us, trust that no future time will be better to cut fire-wood than the present—that is, the winter. Have cord wood piled to shed water to the east.

Clearing Land.—This is a very good season in which to blast rocks, cut alder and willows, and often those tussocks of coarse grass, called "bogs." Ditches may be dug in swamps, and such work done.

Thaws.—Those of the Northern States where the land is often covered with great masses of snow, are liable to thaws, coming in consequence of heavy and warm rains.—See that no damage occurs from a great rush of water over the frozen surface, or from its being dammed up behind drifts, and entering cellar walls; and stand ready to take advantage of even a temporary breaking up.

Ice-Houses.—It rarely happens that ice does not form, during January, sufficiently to pack. Cut as soon as six inches of clear ice can be got.—Ice-houses fail to keep ice for one of three reasons: either there is not perfect drainage, in which case the ice goes very rapidly; or there is access of air to the ice through the foundation or under the sills; or the ice was not well packed. There should be a great abundance of straw, or chaff on the floor, and the ice on all sides should be packed with sawdust, chaff, or straw, while plenty of straw should be used to cover the surface.

Order Trees early; if one lives near a nursery it will sometimes pay him to give an extra price for the privilege of digging his own trees.

Rabbits are troublesome, especially when the snow is on the ground.—Among the various preventives blood has been found the most easy of application and as efficacious as any.—One sprinkling will last all winter.—If blood cannot be obtained readily, rub the trunks of the trees with bloody meat.
