Agricultural.

How and when to Prune.

Pruning trees of any kind, shrubs, vines or bushes, as they should be pruned, is a science requiring the exercise of more skill and mature judgment than is requisite to do anything else connected with the growing of plants and fruit, from the time the tiny seed is laid in the fertile soil until the branches are bending beneath an abundant yield of luscious fruit. Fruit growers talk about pruning in the winter in some instances, and of pruning during the growing season. The true period to prune anything—tree, bush, vine or shrub—is when such things are young and small, and always when the branches are growing. The best instrument that ever was employed for the purpose of pruning is the thumb nail—No saw, axe, hatchet or pruning-knife, will bear any comparison to the efficiency of a strong thumb nail, employed at just the right time. The writer knows what he is relating.—He has reared and trained hundreds of fruit trees and vines, which are now in full bearing, most of which were pruned with the thumb nail.—Occasionally a small pocket-knife was employed, to take off a branch which had been neglected so long that the thumb nail could not serve it. The pruning should begin with the swelling buds. The cultivator should have perfect understanding of what he desires to accomplish by pruning. Before he serves a single bud he should understand the laws of vegetable physiology so far as they affect the flow of sap. There is no chance for correcting bad mistakes in pruning. If one pinches a bud that should remain, it will be ruinous to the form of the tree or bush. There was never a more egregious error promulgated than to allow a bush or tree to grow at pleasure for a few years, and then give it a thorough and severe pruning with saws and axes. Yet this is, and has been, the practice all over the country ever since trees were planted out; and the ruinous consequences of such pruning are manifest wherever large apple trees are found, in the decaying trunks where large branches were cut off; and because the wounds were so large nature could not heal them. This is one of the prominent causes of the failure of the apple crop in New England and in other localities.

The correct way to prune is to set up before the mind a beau ideal of the form of tree or bust desired, even when the tender stem begins to put forth its buds. Then, all through the growing season, the buds should be watched closely. If a bud appears where a branch is not desired, pinch it off, and leave buds on the main stem wherever a branch is desired. Grafts that are now growing from scions that were set last season should be examined frequently, to see if the main stems and laternal branches are all growing uniformly. If a bush, vine or tree, increase in length faster than the stem attains proportional strength and size, apply the thumb nail to the very extremity to check the rampart growth. Grape, vines, and berry bushes of all kinds, need pruning, by pinching off the extreme ends of luxuriant branches, after they have attained a suitable growth. In our latitude the best period to do this work is in July and August. After blackberry and rasberry bushes have grown about four feet high, it is far better for the productiveness of the bushes to pinch off the ends, and make the bushes thicken up nearer the ground than to allow the canes to attain ten feet in length and then cut off the ends.

Blooded Stock

Within a few years past, a great deal has been said and written in favor of blooded stock. The interest has extended to all animals from thoroughbred horses to full-blooded hens. The great cry has been that full-blood was to be the salvation of the stock and stock-keepers and breeders of America. Extravagant prices have been paid for full-blooded animals, and large quantities of paper and ink have been used in their praise. Some of the animals were really splended, while others were "no better than their neighbors," except that they had fashionable blood. But there has seemed to be a general disposition among the farmers of this country to look up with reverence to the men who imported blooded animals, and look with great admiration on the animals themselves. This, in a proper measure, is right. The men who imported blooded animals are public benefactors, and are doing a great favor to the farmers of our country, and a really splendid animal is worthy of admiration, but these feelings may be, and we believe are caried to excess.

And we believe the great secret of success with blooded stock, is not entierly its superiority over native breeds or grades, but is largely owing to another reason, which is this—blooded stock almost universally receive better care and feed than natives or grades. It is natural that this should be the case. They cost so much more, the owners feel a far greater interest in full blood than in other stock, and in order to save both reputation and money they are bound to do all for them that care and attention can accomplish.

But I would not condemn blood stock. On the contrary, I freely admit its superiority, but I would have the ordinary farmer feel that he can have good and even extra stock, though he cannot afford to buy full-bloods, for, the difference is not entierly with the breed; and the same care, feed and attention bestowed upon natives, or still better, upon grades, which is received by full-bloods, would greatly increas their value, and materially lessen the difference between the selling price of full-bloods and other stock.—American Farmer.

TRANSPLANTING IN THE NIGHT.—A gentleman anxious to acertain the effect of transplanting in the night, instead of in the day, made an experiment with the following result: He transplanted ten cherry trees while in bloom, commencing at four o'clock in the afternoon, and transplanting one each hour until one in the morning. Those transplanted during daylight shed their blossoms, producing little or no fruit, while those transplanted during the darker portions maintained their condition fully. He did the same with ten dwarf pear trees, after the fruit was one-third grown. Those transplanted during the day shed their fruit; those transplanted during the night perfected their crop, and showed no injury from having been removed. With each of these trees he removed some earth with the roots. —Exchange.
