Agricultural.

Stock Raising and Dairying.

Animals should be kept growing all the time during winter as well as summer. By thus doing heifers, if of good breed, are of ample size to come in when they are two years old; and thereafter, while making all their future growth, they not only pay their own way, but they pay a profit besides. Stock raising and dairying in this section should always be combined to realize the highest success. In this way beeves may be prepared for market when they are three years old, and so on all the way up to seven years old. If heifers, when they come in promise to become good milkers, they should be kept until their frames attain the large stand most profitable size before they are fattened for beeves. But if for any reason they prove unsatisfactory as milkers, then they can be fattened at an earlier age. Still the poorest milker can be made to give milk enough to pay the entire expense of fattening, while good milkers will pay a large profit over and above such expense.

The whole secret of getting a large flow of milk from cows is to feed high, and to exercise good judgment in the kind of feed used. In the summer season, when pastures are good, the flow of milk is usually good, without much care or attention.—But even at this favorable season, so advantageous is variety in food, it would be better to give cows a little well cured hay or clover every day, which is frequently craved for animals stomachs, filled to excess with the juices of green grasses. To have access even to a stack of wheat straw is highly beneficial; and this of itself has been found a complete preventative to hoven in cattle when turned out on to green and succulent clover in spring.

But it is the fall, winter and spring, when the flow of milk too often fails to be kept up in milch cows, to be profitable, they should have all the feed they want. The more they will eat, the greater the profit to be derived from them. Here it is an object to vary their food, so they will have at all times a good appetite and be heavy eaters. Two quarts of corn meal placed in a bucket and the bucket filled two thirds full of boiling hot water, and the whole stirred, and afterwards wheat bran added to thicken, until the vessel is filled (letting it stand long enough to get sufficiently cooled), is an excellent morning and evening mess for a cow. But oil cake meal in the place of the corn meal, serves as a good substitute, a third or a half the time. At noon each day a peck (or half a peck) of turnips or beets, carrots, potatoes, or apples should be given. As turnips, however, and oil cake meal also, are apt to impart a slightly objectionable taste to the milk, unless fed immediately after milking, the noon feeding would be better to be the corn meal and bran, when the former articles are a portion of the daily feed. Of course an ample supply of clover hay, corn fodder or sheaf oats, should be given besides the three messes we have named. Clover hay is always excellent for milch cows, and as two and a half tons can begrown to the acre (one and a half tons the first cutting, and one ton the second cutting,) this should uniformly be provided as being the best and most economical hay. Corn fodder, however, when on hand, may be given alternately with this. Of course cows should have all the pure water they want.

In this section porbably no feed is so cheap to raise for animals as corn. There is as much nutriment in bushel of corn meal as there is in four or five bushels of turnips. And yet, so beneficial are roots, that we would willingly pay the same price for turnips as for corn, rather than a cow should not have at least half a peck of turnips or something similar every day.

Milch cows, taken care of in the manner we have described, will be increasing in flesh all through the winter, and the milk from each cow will be worth at least fifty cents a day. Consequently ten cows, giving milk throughout, the winter, would bring in daily profit of three dollars, besides the increase in flesh of the cows and the immense quantity of manure produced.—Rural New Yorker.

Thirsting for Land.

One of those most grievous errors of the past and present generation of American farmers, is the almost insatiable thirst for more land. Not one of a thousand, though possessed of five times as many acres as he can profitably or successfully till, is satisfied. While this is perfectly natural, it is at the same time very unwise. The farmer recognizes his wealth in the multiplication of his broad acres, just as the merchant or banker does his in the accumulation of greenbacks; but the difference between the two is that the farmer may add acre to acre, without the ability to render the investments productive, while the merchant or banker has no difficulty in finding profitable investments for his greenbacks. It is always bad policy to buy more land, and give manure in homeopathic doses to that already in possession.

The safe and sure guide for the farmer is to attempt the cultivation of no more acres than he can keep in perfect good heart, and every day's experience demonstrates the fact that, with occasional exceptions, a little farm well tilled is more profitable in the end than a large one indifferently cultivated. We once read a story of a Frenchman who had two daughters. One of them married, and received one-half of the paternal vineyard as her dowry. To the old man's suprise, the half he had reserved, receiving as much cultivation as he formerly bestowed on the whole, yielded as much as the whole had. The second married, and he gave her one-half of what he had left, and still he had as many grapes from his remaining fourth as he used to get from the whole. There is a whole volume of practical truth in this little anecdote. Its moral is, attempt the cultivation of no more land than you can cultivate well.

BUTTERMILK BREAD.—One quart of buttermik, a small teaspoonful of salt, one of saleratus, a lump of butter as large as a walnut, and flour enough to make a stiff batter. Bake in butter tins, in a quick oven.

THE American Agriculturist gives the following summary of the things necessary in fattening pork economically: A good breed; good housing; early fattening; a variety of food; regular feeding three times a day.

COOKIES.—Two cups of sugar, one cup of butter, half a cup of sour milk, half a teaspoon of soda.
