Agricultural.

Rotation of Manures.

It is the general experience of cultivators of the soil that after a series of very heavy manurings, the manures used being of one kind, the effect seems to diminish and a ton of the same manure does not produce the same effect in increasing the crop that it formerly did Although such a result is not frequent in farm practice, owing to the fact that manure is in general applied to farm lands in far too small proportion to allow of the soil's getting tired of it, yet causes are on record where this result has been produced. Guano, bone dust, lime and even farm-yard manure have all exhibited this peculiarity, Alderman Mechi tells us that after a few years his land refused to respond to the same extent that it had formerly done. The limit to the action of bone-dust is even more quickly reached and more obvious; and although farm yard manure is probably that which is best entitled to the term universal, yet even lands to which it has been bountifully applied do sometimes crave something else. There is hardly a city in the country where gardens are not to be found of which it is said they have been made too rich.

Various explanations have been given of this fact. The well known explanaiton of Leibig that unless all the elements required by a plant are present the extent to which the element existing in smaller quantity is present determines the resulting fertility, has been pretty generally accepted, at least so far as the most important elements are concerned. An attempt has also been made to explain it on the ground that while an addition of manure to poor causes very marked results, the same amount added to rich land does not produce a correspondingly proportionate improvement.

But to whatever cause the fact that we have stated it due, it is certain that those who have attained the greatest measures of success have used various measures. One of my neighbors after dosing his garden liberally with stable manure for years, found his crops deteriorating. A resort to bone dust and guano instead of stable manure remedied the evil. Another acquaintance found his garden in the same condition from the same cause in his case a liberal application of fresh soil worked a speedy cure.

It is not impossible that in both of these cases the land had become "soggy," and merely required areating and pulverising, and this would of course be best accomplished by omitting the manure. At the same time we are inclined to believe that the rotation or alteration of manures deserves more attention than it has hitherto received.

We were pleased to observe that the views of Mr. Henderson, author of "Gardenig for Profit," coincide with ours upon this point. He says: "In applying manures to the soil, we have long ago discovered the great importance of an alteration of different kinds When I first began business as a market gardener, I had opportunities of getting large quantities of night soil from the scavengers of Jersey City; this was mixed with street manure, charcoal, sawdust or any other absorbent most convenient, and applied so mixed at the rate of 30 tons per acre. The crops raised with this manure were enormous for two or three years, but gradually began to lose effect, and in five years from the time we began to use it, it required nearly double the weight of this compost to produce even an average crop. I then abandoned the use of night soil and applied refuse hops instead, at the rate of about 60 tons per acre with marked improvement; but this was for the first and second years only, the third year showing a falling off. About this time our prejudices against the use of concecrated manures for market gardening began to give way, and at first we applied guano together with manure at the rate of 300 pounds per acre which we found to pay; and the next season, guano was used at the rate of 1200 lbs. to the acre, with very satisfactory results. Since then our practice has been a systematic alteration of manures, which I am convinced is of quite as much importance to the production of uniform crops of first quality, as it is the alteration of varieties of the different kinds of vegetables."

The principles which should govern us in carrying out the above practical hints deseve greater consideration than they have hitherto received, for we are convinced that while the maxim for the majority of our farmers is simply, "make and use all the manure you can," he who would attain the highest results must give earnest attention to a proper rotation of manures.—Country Gentleman.

CARROTS.—Carrots possess not only fattening properties equal to oats, but secure to the horse in winter fine health, loose skin, and a glossy coat of hair. An acre of land which will produce seventy bushels of oats, will produce five hundred bushels of carrots. When first given they are diuretic and laxative; but as the horse becomes accustomed to them these effects cease to be produced. Horses thrive on carrots, and some judicious farmers feed their horses with equal proportions of oats and carrots. From the healthful effects resulting from their regular but moderate use they would be advantageously purchased at the same price as oats, if they could be procured no cheaper.

NEW ORCHARDS.—The high price of fruit and the facilities which now exist for shipping it to distant markets are inducing farmers to enlarge their orchards or to plant new ones. In the laying out of the ground for new orchards attention should be given to the aspect and nature of the soil. Thorough drainage should be secured. Some soils are situated on a gravelly or porous sub-soil; and, being thus naturally drained, do not require the application of artificial means. Subsoiling is very beneficial in preparing land for fruit-trees, as it breaks up the hard-pan, deepens the soil, and permits the roots to decend to a suitable depth without coming in contact with stagnant water.

THERE is no danger of getting too much fruit, for the demand for the best qualities exceeds the supply. Every one loves fruit and but few have all of it they desire.

9 Thou shalt not bear false witness, but honestly acknowledge that you can get better suited and for less money, at Rosenberg & Wolff's than any other store.
10. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbors goods or his bargains, for Rosenberg & Wolff can give them to you likewise; therefore, take counsel, and buy only of Rosenberg & Wolff the Once Price Men
