FARM NOTES.

TIMELY HINTS FOR THE HUSBANDMAN

Shady Trees in Pasture and Along Highways—Root Pruning Pear Trees—Failure in Seedling Fruits.

Germantown Telegraph.

This subject is again brought prominently forward, as the hot weather is upon us; and one of our agricultural contemporaries, in very properly referring to the necessity of shade in pasture fields, says: "Every farmer will consult his interests by planting shade trees plentifully." We do not, however, agree with him in this, for when planted in excess of the demands of the stock they are an injury and a nuisance. Their shade and roots generally exhaust the land, to say nothing of the obstruction they will prove to cultivation, which must tend to the diminution of the crops. Some journals—even those mainly devoted to agriculture—frequently overdo or undo things. They seem to hold that if a little of a thing is good, doubling the little will be twice as good. We knew a man who pursued this method in taking medicine. The dose prescribed was three pills; but he argued that six pill would naturally render him twice the benefit. But it liked to have cost him his life. The lesson was a severe one, but he never forgot it.

While on the shade-tree question, we cannot resist mentioning that up to this date—some six or seven years after the passage of the act of Assembly—we have not heard of any farmers having planted trees along the roadside, in compliance with the act with the view of realizing, while bestowing a supposed benefit upon the public, a direct pecuniary benefit from it themselves; and we say now, as we said when the act was passed, that we don't think that we shall ever hear of many. Farmers would rather pursue their own course in the matter, and to plant such trees when and where they choose, instead of being under the surveillance of the law. They prefer to do with their own as they please, and not enter upon a partnership concern with the Legislature and have their hands tied with the provisions of a state law.

Neither have we heard of more than three or four persons in the eastern counties of the state, who have set up watering troughs in accordance with the conditions of another act of Assembly, passed at about the same time, for the accommodation of the traveling public, in order to obtain a trifling abatement of tax. A general appeal to persons from whose premises rivulets pass into the highway, where it would be convenient to establish such troughs, would probably secure more of these valuable accommodations as a pure act of kindness and good neighborhood, than as a mere money getting contrivance, which few respectable farmers would be willing to agree to, and which at the same time, like in the case of the shade trees, would oblige them to comply with certain conditions of the law.

Root-Pruning Pear Trees.

We are aware that in France and England the root pruning of dwarf pear trees is very generally pursued, and it has also become quite the custom here among the most thorough growers of pears or quince. The reason for shortening the roots is to check the rampant growth of some varieties, and to obtain earlier bearing, better yields, as well as to secure the trees against blight, which frequently attacks rapid growers, among which are the Ott, Tyson, Bello Lucrative, Lawrence, St. Michael, Winkfield, Dial, etc. Our practice is to sink the spade full depth in a circle about three feet from the stem, and this should be done about every third year.

Failure in Seedling Fruits.

One of the most singular matters in fruit raising is the failure of producing improved fruit from the seeds of fruits of superior kinds. There may be instances, but we are not conversant with them, of success in obtaining improved varieties of pears, apples, etc, from kinds already of superior quality. But for as many years as we can remember, attempts have been made in this direction and they have all been failures. With the Seckel, especially, which is at the head of the pear list, no success has been the result of every trial. The Ott is a seedling of the Seckel, and is the best of the many attempts, but is very far behind the parent, though somewhat earlier and no larger. It would have been regarded as a great achievement if the size could be doubled and the quality of the original retained; and it was this that was solely aimed at, as it would be next to impossible to have the latter improved. All our best pears have been accidental seedlings found in hedges or some out of the way places. The Seckel was found in a fence corner down in "The Neck," in Philadelphia county; and the "Tyson," next to the Seckel in quality, and much larger, was found in a hedge along a fence on the farm of a Mr. Tyson, near Jenkintown, six miles north of Germantown. We must therefore, await the coming of others of superior quality under like circumstances.

THE STUDY OF LEGISLATION.

Herbert Spencer on the Qualifications of Law Makers.

Popular Science Monthly.

There lie before the legislator several open secrets, which yet are so open that they ought not to remain secrets to any one who undertakes the vast and terrible responsibility of dealing with millions upon millions of human beings by measures which, if they do not conduce to their happiness, will increase their miseries and accelerate their deaths.

There is first of all the undeniable truth conspicuous and yet absolutely ignored, that there are no phenomena which a society presents but what have their origins in the phenomena of individual human life, which again have their roots in vital phenomena at large. And there is the inevitable implication that unless these vital phenomena, bodily and mental, are chaotic in their relations (a supposition excluded by the very maintenance of life) the resulting phenomena cannot be wholly chaotic; there must be some kind of order in the phenomena which grow out of them when associated human beings have to cooperate. Evidently, then, when one who has not studied such resulting phenomena of social order undertakes to regulate society he is pretty certain to work mischiefs.

In the second place, apart from a priori reasoning, this conclusion should be forced on the legislator by comparisons of societies. It ought to be sufficiently manifest that before meddling with the details of social organization, inquiry should be made whether social organization has a natural history, and that, to answer this inquiry, it would be well, setting out with the simplest societies, to see in what respects social structures agree. Such comparative sociology, pursued to a very small extent, shows a substantial uniformity of genesis. The habitual existence of chieftainship and the establishment of chiefly authority by war; the rise everywhere of the medicine man and priest, the presence of a cult having in all places the same fundamental traits; the traces of division of labor, early displayed, which gradually become more marked; and the various complications, political, ecclesiastical, industrial, which arise as groups are compounded and recompounded by war—quickly prove to any one who compares them, that apart from all their special differences, societies have general resemblances in their modes of origin and development. They present traits of structure showing that social organization has laws which override individual wills; and laws the disregard of which must be fraught with disaster.

And then, in the third place, there is that mass of guiding information yielded by the records of law making in our own country and in other countries, which still more obviously demands attention. Here and elsewhere attempts of multitudinous kinds, made by kings and statesmen, have failed to do the good intended and have worked unexpected evils. Century after century new measures like the old ones, and other measures akin in principal, have again disappointed hopes and again brought disaster. And yet it is thought neither by electors nor by those they elect that there is any need for systematic study of that legislation which in bygone ages went on working the ill being of the people when it tried to achieve their well being. Surely their can be no fitness for legislative functions without wide knowledge of those legislative experiences which the past has bequeathed.

A Cautious Purchaser.

New York Sun.

"I was recommended here by a friend," said a seedy looking man, as he entered a drug store, "who told me that you did a very large business and that any purchases I might want to make could be effected on reasonable terms."

"Yes, sir; certainly, sir. We have built up a very large trade by faithful attention to business, and by honest efforts to please our numerous customers."

"Such a line of policy, I take it," said the seedy-looking man, gazing at the proprietor with an air of great confidence, "contains the essential elements of commercial success. A conscientious consideration for the wants of one's customers, while, at the same time, a proper observance of what is due one's self, will win in the long run. I am a professional man myself, but I take considerable pride in stating that I am, nevertheless, a practical man, and possessed of practical ideas."

"Undoubtedly, sir, undoubtedly," responded the druggist, rubbing his hands, expectantly; and now, what can we do for you, sir?"

"You may give me a two cent postage stamp, if you please."
