Agricultural.

Facts in Stock Raising.

Many farmers say it does not pay to keep stock, and in point of fact, they are very often in the right. I can hardly see how it pays to keep a wether sheep three years and six months, getting say $7 for the three fleeces, and then selling them for $3. But I think it must be quite as profitable as to keep a steer the same length of time and then sell him for $50. Such a steer will eat as much as eight or ten Merino sheep. But the truth is we cannot expect to make anything by keeping stock of any kind unless we keep it well; it must be gaining all the time. If we let a machine lie idle, all that we lose is the interest on the money which it cost. But an animal cannot be kept idle.

It must eat every day; and it gains nothing; we lose all the food and the interest on the value of the animal machine besides. But many farmers not only keep them for weeks and months together without their gaining anything, but it not unfrequently happens that the animals actually decrease in weight. It has to live on its own flesh and fat—which is certainly a very expensive food. Even in the case of well-fed pigs, which store up more flesh and fat for the food than any other domestic animal; for every pound of flesh and fat we get in the animal, they eat about five pounds of food. They use four pounds to live on and give us one pound of flesh. And when we have got this one pound, how excessively wasteful it is to feed it to the animal and have worked over again; and yet this is precisely what thousands of farmers are doing to-day with cows, sheep and pigs. No wonder that "keeping stock does not pay." But good stock, fed liberally and with care and judgement, will pay better, all things considered, than any other branch of farming. Good meat brings a good price, and is always in demand. It is the "Scallawags" that are hard to dispose of, and always at a loss—a loss to the producer and a loss to the consumer. Those why buy such meat get little besides bones and water. The poor animals have had to live on their own fat and their nutritions juices.

The first step in keeping good stock is to make the land dry and clean. The next is to feed liberally, and this will insure good manure, and that in its turn insures good crops.

It is very well to say that a "peck of clover seed to the acre is the cheapest fertilizers," and that by its free use we can dispense with manure. I do not dispute the truth of this proposition. No one thinks more highly of clover than I do. But it only tells half the story. Clover makes good food and good manure too. An animal will take out the food, convert it into valuable products, and leave the manure behind. Our aim should be dry, clean land, more clover and rich grass, and better stock and more and better manure.

It cannot be too often repeated, however, that the value of manure depends on the food and not on the animals. A rawboned steer, if it has the same food, will make as rich manure as the best Short-horn in the herd book; and the droppings of a Merino sheep living on clover hay and oil-cake are just as valuable as those from a Cotswold. But this is the point: We cannot feed clover hay and oil-cake to a Merino with half the profit that we can to a Cotswold. The former is adapted to live on comparative poor food and grow slowly; the Cotswold has been bred with especial reference to rapid growth on rich food. So when we advocate keeping well bred stock, in order to make rich manure, we do so for the simple reason that we cannot afford to feed rich food to poor stock, and without rich food we cannot have rich manure.—American Agriculturist.

Book-Farming.

Those who are opposed to book-farming are requested to read the following, and give us their opinion: There was a farmer once who hesitated not to hurl all manner of invective against book-farming and those who consulted books for advice. By long experience and careful observation, he had become quite successful in the culture of grapes and trees. His fields were clean and fair, and highly productive. His trees were vigorous, well adjusted, and profitable. In conversation with a friend, he related his experience in raising grapes and trees, entering into the minutest detail, sometimes becoming quite eloquent when describing his victories over the enemies which infest them. "His knowledge," he said, "was gained by dint of application, by actual experience and hard labor. It was none of your book knowledge written by men who knew nothing about farming." "Well, said his friend, "if all this valuable information, gained by assiduous labor and observation, of so many years, and which you have so clearly described, were written out and published, which would you have a young and inexperience man do—take this as he finds it from your pen, or go through the same tedious process that you have gone through with, including all its vexations and losses? The question puzzled him, and he was silent for a moment; but was obliged at last to confess that, after all, there was value in books, because combining and retaining the results and experience of practical cultivators.

Do not condemn book-farming. You may criticise certain books very severely, because written by ignorant, theoretical hands; but there is always good wheat as well as abundant chaff. So there are many good books as well poor ones. The time may come, when a single hint from a book or paper may save your farm or orchard, or add to your wealth, by telling you how to increase your crops.

USEFUL HINTS.—A bit of glue dissolved in skim milk will restore crape.

Ribbons of every kind should be washed in cold suds and rinsed.

If your flat irons are rough rub them with fine salt and it will make them perfectly smooth.

If you are buying a carpet for durability choose small figures.

A bit of soap rubbed on the hinge of a door will prevent its creaking.

Scotch snuff put in holes where crickets come out will destroy them.

Wood ashes and common salt wet with water will prevent the cracking of a stove.

Strong lye put in water will make it soft as rain water.

Half a cranberry, it is said, bound on a corn will soon kill it.

A LADY writes us, complaining that the pudding she made according to a recipe given in our paper, recently, was not fit for a dog to eat. If she will again refer to the paper she will find the recipe was for making a poultice, not a pudding.
