A Singular Character.

The Baltimore American notes the recent death in that city of a man whose economical habits entitle him to a niche in the gallery of misers. His name was Henry Breamer, and shortly before his death he announced to a friend that during his whole life he had never given away a cent, nor spent one when it was not absolutely necessary. Four years ago he married a third wife, who, by the way, is a young woman, but he had held her well in hand and compelled her to work in a factory. Her weekly earnings were regularly turned over to Breamer, who attended personally to all household matters and bought the food they lived upon. About six years ago he bought a second-hand pine coffin case from an undertaker, and that piece of furniture was stored away in the upper part of the house until it would come into use. A few days ago before dying he told his wife that his funeral expenses must not exceed ten dollars, and he decided that his mortal remains could be carried to the grave-yard by two or three men much cheaper than they could be hauled in a hearse. On making inquiry it was found that it would cost about twelve dollars to employ six men to convey the miser's remains to the grave, and rather than to pay that sum an express wagon was hired for five dollars to do the job. The night previous to his death Breamer sent for a barber and was shaved, as that operation would have cost one dollar if postponed until after his death while before it cost but ten cents. The funeral procession consisted of the furniture wagon containing the remains, and eleven friends and relatives of the deceased who followed along on foot. The faithful wife of the dead man carried out his instructions to the letter, and the total expenses attending the funeral amounted to $8.75. Breamer had during his life managed by strict attention to miserly scrape together $30,000. He made a will leaving the property to his son in Indiana and his wife, but cautioning them to handle it carefully.

☞ Said a Missouri preacher: "Thar's a powerful sight of giggling back thar in the corner, and it's got to be stopped, or the Lord will delegate me to open the door and throw some one out!"
