MONTROSE, PENN'A:

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 12, 1870.

Washington's Wedding.

It is now some years since I visited a venerable edifice intimately connected with the life of a great man—old St. Peter's Church, in New Kent county, Virginia, where Washington was married.

Let us leave for a moment, the bustle, turmoil and "rush" of the Iron age, and go back to the last century, when life was more deliberate, solid and picturesque. The old church, of which I speak, takes you easily back, as you gaze at it; and there is the added interest of its association with the nuptials of Washington.

Old St. Peter's was built as far back as 1703, and is a long, low building of 'sun dried bricks,' brought over from England, as was then the habit, with a steep roof, and walls embrowned with age. A square tower rises above the vestibule, on a level with the ground, and in this tower is the vestry room, to which you ascend by a lofty flight of ancient and creaking steps. Crowning the tower is a sort of steeple, surmounted by crossed rods, bearing the letters "N. S. E. W." and on the summit of all is a small portion of the old weather cock, which probably reered in the winds of the last century.

The surroundings of the time honored edifice are as antique as the building which stands on its wooded knoll, with the sturdy air of a veteran, careless of "time and tide." On the bricks are carved names and dates, by hands that have long crumbled. One of these dates is 1739. On a great tombstone beneath the oriel window, walled up, for some reason, is a coat of arms, raised in bass relief—a shield with a "lone star" upon it; above a knight's vizard, with the coronet—of a duke or marquis apparently—encircling it, and surmounting all, the grinning head of a wolf. On this stone, dark and durable, as was the marble of that epoch, is cut the date "1716. Not a tracery has grown dim—not a letter or figure is indistinct. The wolf's tongue lolls out fiercely, his eyes glare, his teeth snarl. The rain and snow and sunshine have fallen for a century and a half on the knightly helmet and the head of the wolf—and neither rain, snow, or sunshine has affected the iron surface.

These objects take you back to a remote period, very unlike the present, when buildings, tombstones, and all other things, seem constructed of trancient materials. Another memorial of old times is the grove of tall oaks round the church. What picturesque scenes these must have witnessed! Beneath their spreading branches, generation, rolled the chariots of old time Virginians, drawn by their four horses, and containing the squire, his wife, and maidens and children attending church, to these boughs were tethered the bridles of thorough bred horses, ridden by gallant youths. Yonder the chariots discharged their burdens—the pompous old lord of the manor the good dame his wife, and the little beauty, their daughter, in her great hooped dress, square bodice, powdered hair, and red heeled shoes, as she raises her silk dress and scarlet "petticoat," as they called it then. You may see her still, in imagination, as she smiles and nods, slaying with her brightness the youths with embroidered coats, long waistcoats and ruffles, who hasten to assist her, and contend for the touch of the small hand.

All that has passed away; the youths and maidens are long dead. The parson no more sweeps down the vestry stairs, or thunders, in his high, tub shaped pulpit above the listeners in the lofty pews. Squire and dame, and parson, and gallant lover, and little beauty live alone in the memory of the great oaks, which waved above them, leave still, and will probably rustle their leaves in the winds of another century.

Such is and was old St. Peter's church an interesting relic to day of a time that is long dead; interesting, more than all, as I have said, as having been the scene of Washington's wedding.

The incident which led to that event is worth narrating, and something of a comedy, I hope, in relating it, I shall not be charged with "irreverence" to the memory of the famous bridegroom.

He was a man of lofty pride, august dignity—a very grand type of God, and "fell in love" at least twice in his life, like the humblest of his species. This was his second love, and something of romance was connected with the origin of the affair.

It was in the spring of 1758. Mr. Custis, a planter residing at his estate called the 'White House,' was riding out one morning, when he met, coming from the northward, a young gentleman of military appearance, excellently mounted, and accompanied by a gaunt old servant, or sargeant, who rode respectfully a few paces behind his master. The new comer was Colonel George Washington, on his way from Winchester to Williamsburg, and his attendant, Bishop, formerly Braddock's body servant, now his own.

Washington was twenty five at that time, and a young man of great sedateness and dignity. He was in chief command of the frontier, and saw or thought little of the fair sex. But, on this spring morning of 1758, his "time had come."

Mr. Custis greeted him, and invited him to stop at the White House. He would do so with pleasure, but it would be for half an hour only. His business was pressing; he must hasten on to see his excellency at Williamsburg. And conversing, they rode back and reached the White House. Here Washington dismounted, and delivered his horse to Bishop, with orders to wait him there; he would continue his journey in half an hour. Bishop saluted gravely, with hand raised to his hat; his master entered the house, and the half hour passed—the old servant waiting patiently.

His master did not, however, make his appearance. The event was unheard of Col. Washington was the soul of punctuality; he was on pressing public business; what could be the meaning of this strange and unwonted delay?

An hour passed—two hours—passed. Col. Washington did not re appear. But a servant came out and delivered an order from him to the motionless old body guard. He would conduct the horses to the stables; his master would dine, and possibly spend the night with Mr. Custis. Bishop obeyed—the world was clearly coming to an end!—and Col. Washington was the guest of the owner of the White House.

On the next morning Bishop in obedience to orders to that effect, saddled the horses and waited before the door for the Colonel, who designed setting out, he said immediately. Two hours afterward, there was still no signs of him. Then the servants came again, and directed the horses to be led back; Col. Washington would remain to dinner and then continue his journey.

The day was far spent when the young soldier made his appearance, and vaulted into the saddle. Tall, vigorous, graceful, and with a certain loftiness of port, even then distinguishable, he was a gallant looking cavalier—one whom any woman might admire.

One was gazing at him through the window—a young lady of about his own age, with rosy cheeks, bright eyes, hair carried back from the forehead and a neck resembling snow, above the square cut bodice. The young colonel reined his high spirited horse, nearly throwing him upon his haunches, made a courteous salute with his right hand, (it was nearly the attitude of a bronze statue of him afterwards,) and galloped away thinking probably of the bright eyes and lips.

"Colonel George Washington, of Mt. Vernon," had seen for the first time Mrs. Martha Custis, the beautiful young widow, who, a year after, was to become his wife.

Tradition related that the ceremony took place in old St. Peter's Church, which we have referred to in the beginning of this sketch. The scene was a brilliant one, and may interest the reader. It was in January, 1759. The Rev. Dr. Mossom, parson of the parish, attended in full canonicals, and the pair advanced, followed by a bevy of beauties and groomsmen. Washington was clad in a suit of blue and silver, lined with red silk; his waistcoat was embroidered; his knee and shoe buckles were of gold; his hair was powdered; and he wore a dress sword. The bride was dressed in white satin, with rich pointed lace ruffles; pearl ornaments in her hair; pearl necklace, ear rings and bracelets; white satin shoes, with high heels and diamond buckles; and was followed, as has been said, by an array of beautiful and richly dressed girls, leaning upon the arms of groomsmen, in costume as imposing. The vice regal Gov. of Virginia, in a suit of scarlet, embroidered with gold, with huge bag wig and dress sword, was seen in the midst of a number of officers of the English army and navy; and a great crowd of what were then called "the gentry"—friends and relations of the bride and groom—filled the church, all intent upon the "interesting ceremony." One personage has been forgotten! Bishop, the old body servant. He, too, was present. With folded arms, and much emotion on his aged face, he gazed at the ceremony with the rest.

It was soon ended and the brilliant crowd flowed forth from the old church. Tradition relates that the bride and as many of her fair attendants as could do so entered the great chariot, which rolled off, drawn by its six spirit of horses; while the bridegroom, fondered horseback, mounted the splendid English charger bequeathed to him by Braddock, and cantered after the coach, attended by a number of gallant youths.

Such was that picturesque scene in the life of the "Father of his country." We see so much of the great soldier, statesman, and ruler, that it is pleasant to catch a glimpse of the lover and bridegroom. Why not? One phase of the individual—the public and official phase—presents only the profile; to obtain the full likeness, the other phase must be delineated, too. The unreasonable theory has been to regard George Washington as an abstraction of patriotism and virtue, when he was a man like other men, with strong passions and human sympathies and infirmities. The result has been that he has failed in a measure to impress the heart. Men admire, but are chilled by him—by that grand bronze statue under which a heart never beat. Such an idea is a fallacy. Few human being have ever felt more deeply than Washington. He loved warmly, and, if he did not hate bitterly, it was because his moral nature revolted from hatred, the sister of injustice, and his immense self control enabled him to rule himself.

But this moral discourse is apart from the aim of the little sketch here presented. If that sketch be without "historic importance," it may claim perhaps, the merit of being characteristic. The contrast at least is something. Few men are left of that man's mould, and our weddings to day are prosaic. Blue and silver coat, with red silk lining are not the fashion. Six horse chariots have disappeared. All that brilliant life of the past has faded into the unpicturesque nineteenth century, and the poetry, splendor, and romance have all turned to prose.

But the great oaks and old church, lost in the wilds of New Kent, are still there. Beneath the trees flashed that brilliant cortege of old days—in that building Geo, Washington placed the ring on the finger of his bride. All has passed away now; the stately and beautiful figures have long lain down in their tombs, but the stubborn trunks, with their ancient inscriptions, remain to call the life of the past.—From Appleton's Journal.

Mrs. Notable, or Nineteen Plateful.

"My dear," said Mrs. Green to her husband one morning, "the meal which we borrowed from Mr. Black, a few days ago, is almost out, and we must bake to-morrow."

"Well," replied the husband, "send and borrow half a bushel at Mr. White's, he sent to mill yesterday."

"And when it comes, shall we return the peck we borrowed more than a month ago from the Widow Gray?"

"No," said the husband gruffly; "the can send for it when she wants it. John, do you go down to Mr. Brown's and ask him to lend me his axe to chop some wood this forenoon; ours is dull and I saw him grinding his last night. And James, do you go to Mr. Clark's and ask him to lend me a hammer—and do you hear? you may as well borrow a few nails, while you are about it."

A little boy now enters and says, "Father sent me to ask if you have done with his hoe, which you borrowed a week ago last Wednesday; he wants to use it."

"Wants his hoe, child? What can he want with it? I havenot half done with it yet—but if he wants it, I suppose he must have it. Tell him to send it back though, as soon as he can spare it."

They eat down to breakfast. "Oh la!" exclaims Mrs. Green, "there is not a particle of butter in the house. James, run over to Mrs. Notable's—she always has excellent butter in her dairy; ask her to lend me a plateful."

After a few minutes James returns. "Mrs Notable says she has sent you the butter, but begs you to remember that she has already lent you, nineteen platefuls which are scored on the dairy door."

"Nineteen platefuls!" exclaimed the astonished Mrs. Green, holding up both hands; it is no such thing—I never had half the quanity and if I had, what is a little plateful? I should never think of keeping an account of such a trifling affair. I declare, I have a great mind never to borrow any thing from that mean creature again, as long as I live."

MANHOOD: HOW LOST, HOW RESTORED.

Just published, a new edition of Dr. Culverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical cure (without medicine) of Spermatorrhœa, or Seminal weakness, Involuntary Seminal Losses, Impotency, Mental and Physical Incapacity, Impediments to Marriage, etc.; also, CONSUMPTION, EPILEPSY, and FITS, induced by self-indulgence or sexual extravagance.

☞ Price in sealed envelope, only 6 cents.

The celebrated author, in this admirable essay, clearly demonstrates from a thirty years' successful practice, that the alarming consequences of self-abuse may be radically cured without the dangerous use of internal medicine or the application of the knife; pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain, and effectual, by means of which every sufferer, no matter what his condition may be, may cure himself cheaply, privately, and radically.

☞ This Lecture should be in the hands of every youth and every man in the land.

Sent under seal, in a plain envelope, to any address, postpaid, on receipt of six cents, or two post stamps. Also, Dr. Culverwell's "Marriage Guide," price 25 cts.
