Cromwell, who had the power and the will to dissolve a corrupt Parliament. What next they may give the President may be easily imagined—any thing he may have the courage to ask; if there is time enough, they may pass the standing army bill, and thus consummate the treasonable union of the purse and the sword. There is yet "balm in Gilead." If the people are true to themselves and to their institutions, they will change their rulers—if they fail in this the government will be changed; it passes in effect to a monarchy—money is power, and with money in the hands of unscrupulous men, any change can be effected. There is no disguising the result. At this time, gloomy, ruined and bankrupted, all the prosperity and enterprize of the country gone—at this time, the people almost in despair, Congress passes the Sub-Treasury, and by that act puts chains upon the people. It is folly to think that it can work well—it is a measure that can work nothing but ill—it fetters industry and enterprize, and makes every thing subservient to the government—it is literally what has been frequently said of it, a separation between the Government and the People.

Two days later from England.

The packet ship Sheffield, Capt. Allen, arrived yesterday, bringing London papers to the 4th ult. and Liverpool to the 5th, or two days later from London and one day later from Liverpool, than we received by the Great Western.

There is very little news of any importance. The following summary embraces all of any interest to our readers:

There was a savage riot at Limerick, in Ireland, on the 1st of June. The people came down in immense numbers, carrying poles with loaves stuck on them, and 'down with the forestallers.' They seized a number of carts and wagons, despoiled them of the vegetables and other provisions which they contained, and then bundled 16 of them into the river. A regiment of infantry could make no head against the rioters, and they were not dispersed until the artillery was brought to bear upon them.

The report of the death of the King of Prussia is stated by the London Times of June 4th, to have been premature.

New successes were continually announced as having attended the movements of the Queen's troops in Spain, and the war was evidently drawing to a close.

It is stated that new complications have sprung up in the sulphur question, and that the British Government had resolved on sending six ships of the line to Naples. A French squadron of the same force was also to proceed thither.

Admiral Baudin was to proceed to Buenor Ayres, clothed with military and diplomatic powers to terminate the differences with the Argentine Republic.

By advices from Constantinople to May 15, it appears that a Seraskier, Hali Pasha, brother-in-law to the Sultan, had been dismissed for some offence against morality, tending to bring the Government in contempt.

Paris was visited on the 2d of June by a tremendous thunder storm, which still continued when the mail left.

The administration of the pompes funebres is now preparing the coffin which is to receive at St. Helena the mortal remains of Napoleon. It is to be of solid ebony, in the shape of the ancient sarcophagi, and large enough to enclose the coffins in which the Emperor lies at St. Helena, so that his ashes may not be disturbed. The funeral pall is in velvet, strewed with gold bees, and bordered with a broad band of ermine; at each corner is to be placed an eagle, embroidered in gold, and surmounted with the imperial crown.
