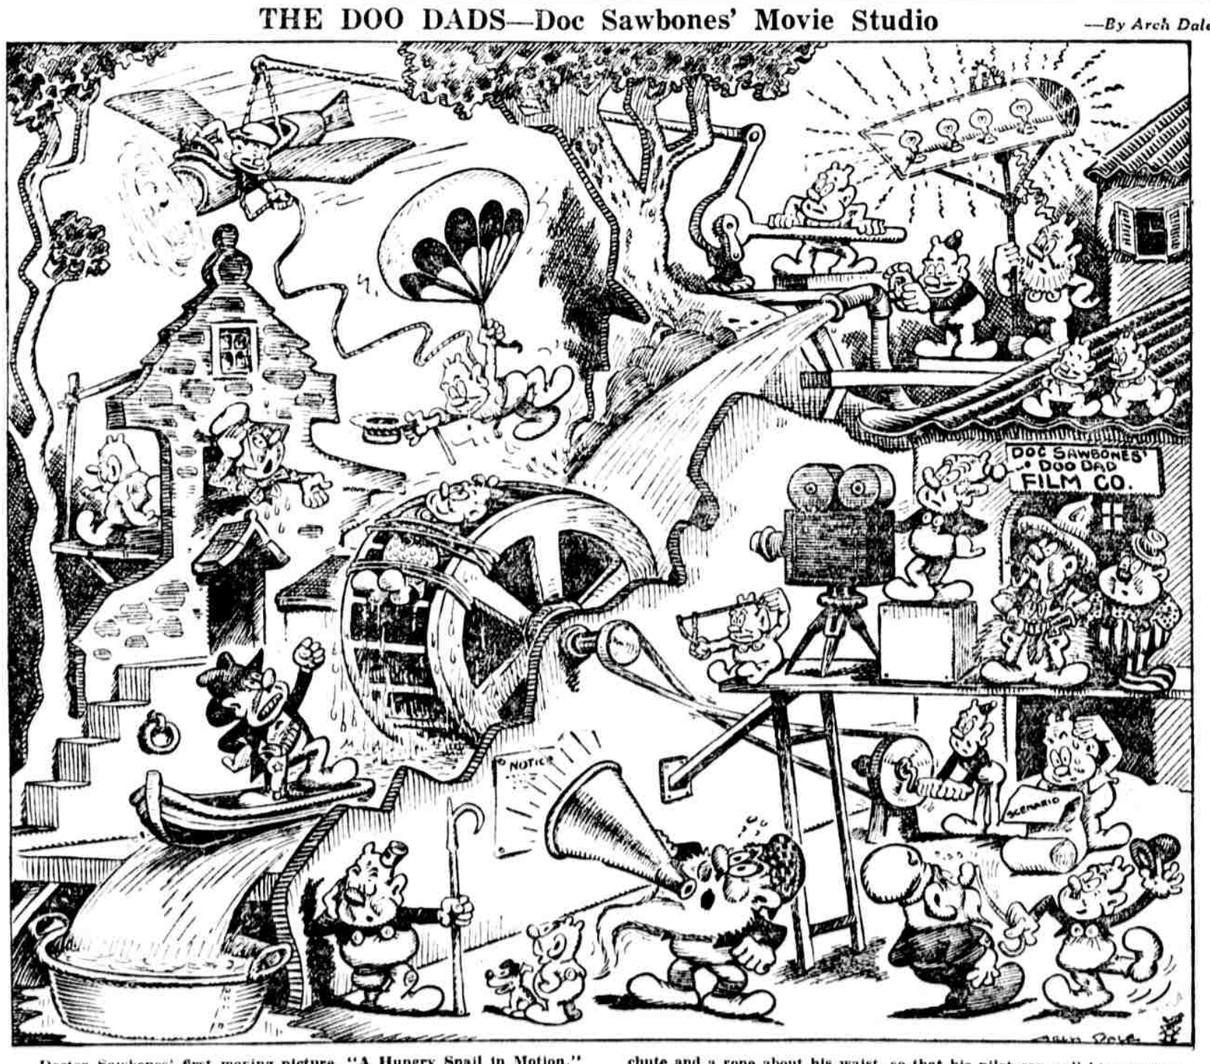
THE DOO DADS—Doc Sawbones' Movie Studio

—By Arch Dale



Doctor Sawbones' first moving picture, "A Hungry Snail in Motion," was shown on the screen in the very largest theatre in Dooville and the Doo Dads were delighted. All the Doo Dads became movie fans. Some wrote scenarios and some purchased costumes and studied play-acting, and Doctor Sawbones built a regular studio with scenery and everything, and here the old Doctor, as director, and Nicholas Nutt, as cameraman, turn out reel after reel of films, comedies and serials and the most thrilling of thrilling feature pictures.

Here Old Doc is directing the making of a wonderful five-reeler. See the villain in the boat shaking his fist at the beautiful heroine, whom he has bound to the water wheel of the old Red Mill. See how brave the heroine looks and how she smiles sweetly—while her poor mother weeps bitterly from the window of the mill; see the hero, who has come to her rescue in an airplane and is lowering himself, to rescue her, with a parachute and a rope about his waist, so that his pilot can pull him up again, hand over hand, after he has released the fair maiden. See the trees and the waterfall. Isn't it funny!

It's only make-believe, you know, for see Roly is turning on the water and Poly, below, is turning the crank to make the wheel go round, and the little Doo Dad above, with his big lever, is holding the flying machine in the air.

Old Sleepy Sam was stationed at the bottom to pull the villain out of the tub of water after he had gone over "the falls," but the old hobo is taking a nap and it looks as if some one else might have to rescue the villain.

There is a cowboy and a fat man and a little chap trying to act like Charlie Chaplin, and, just like Charlie, he is having trouble with a policeman—and little Mr. Bug and the little Doo Dad and the Dog are not sure about its being make-believe and are terribly excited.
