They Love Her —Then Disappear

THE VANISHING MEN

What Becomes of Her Suitors?

THIS BEGINS THE STORY

Peter De Wolfe, an American aviator, instead of going home after the war, accepts an invitation of his friend, Benham, of the British Air Ministry, to visit the latter's home. He hears of a beautiful recluse, Brena Selcross, whose personality and career are mysterious. Muriel Benham, the Colonel's sister, falls in love with him, and at their last meeting kisses him and is jealous when he meets Brena and is impressed with her strange beauty. Muriel tells him the men who love Brena "vanish."

AND HERE IT CONTINUES

Undisclosed Horrors in Wait

THE name of Peter DeWolfe, U. S. A., was upon the register of the Carleton Hotel written in a hand purposely scrawled and blotched to prevent any one in the flux of diplomats, army officers, correspondents and gentlemen adventurers, the classes from which this rich New York bachelor drew a large and almost affectionate acquaintance, from bellowing through his door to come down to the bar.

He was waiting for a steamer that had made up her mind frequently not to leave Liverpool for another five days. Two nights he had spent already in London, where, if he had wished, he might have dined at least one of his a dozen recognized homes, and spent with a Russian ex-ambassador or Tommy Cunningham of the War Office or Bolsby Broke, the critic who writes the reviews for the International Gazette, or taken breakfast with Mrs. Hodgson Rabb, the widow of a certain Minister Rabb's son who has gone along at Oxford. He had an inclination, however, to write verses and wander by himself through the naughty night spots with yellow-haired girls in loose evening gowns and the Circus. He ate his meals in lonely state.

Unfortunately the unpleasant dream which had attached itself to the memory of his visit to Bensonhurst Heath still clung. He could see Lady Benham, that good old soul who had insisted that she never be addressed by her title, beaming at him as she told him how sorry she was that business had called him away so suddenly. He felt some of the politic he he had told the butler his exit from the [illegible]. He could see Muriel's cold, hard expression when, having [illegible] to his, she found no response and left him at once that she hated him. He would never see her again, and though it had been none of his fault, at least not in large measure, there was a certain impression in [illegible] he had wilfully disliked [illegible] correct and virtuous pedantic Colonel Everyay Benham—a good friend provided with a sense of humor—could not fail to see the affair through his beloved sister's unimaginative eyes.

Peter had tried to reach him through the Air Ministry and found that on forty-eight hours' notice he had gone to Mesopotamia.

Above all, Peter had gone to Paris to do a certain thing—to meet the strange Brena Selcross and at Benham's challenge dissolve the mystery which surrounded her. All that he had accomplished so far had been to look once into her wonderful eyes from a distance and hear from Muriel that terrible and unspeakable and undisclosed horrors awaited the man upon whom this extraordinary young woman with her mixture of Greek and Jewish blood, her gorgeous hair and green cream skin, her American origin and her inexplicable English education, bestowed her favor.

Peter had always said that some men were really two persons. One was the man in life, clothed with a suit of flesh and bone; the other, a second personality without tangible reality, but with a counselor possessed of a voice almost audible, often advised against, sometimes played the role of [illegible] and always a friend, but sometimes [illegible] on a dangerous, [illegible] was this invisible friend [illegible] advised Peter to shut his ears to [illegible] attempts at verse writing and had led him to procure a passage home. [illegible] Peter himself who knew very well that he would not go on board the Aquitania, that he had flew to Paris and meet some kind of a [illegible] he had seen her great [illegible] saw these gazing at him out of [illegible] corner now, that he had promised himself to finding out all that [illegible] be known of her and that [illegible] he would do some [illegible] breakneck thing to throw himself with a crash of conventions [illegible] and note what happened afterward.

Peter's determination [illegible] to reject every advice of [illegible] ing and invisible second [illegible] was completely wasted. Brena Selcross acted first.

On the third afternoon [illegible] Hessness, when the light [illegible] and the fog leaned in the [illegible] the window panes of his room [illegible] pile of wet sheep's wool [illegible] a lyric twenty-two times and [illegible] two times balked for [illegible] sive word, had crumbled [illegible] of paper and thrown it [illegible] ker. His pencil was [illegible] pled sheets, in the end [illegible] less afternoon, having passed their [illegible] ceptacle, lay around the floor and Peter Wolfe's product were not poetry but snowballs.

"I'm a nice chump to be writing verses," he said to himself in the mirror. "You look less of a poet than a lion tamer."

Some of Peter's friends, who are also to realize that this man who can play polo like a centaur actually is the author of the lines beginning, "Could ye to the souls of shadows," would have agreed with him. There were strips of interwoven muscle upon his bare brown forearms and a dimness about his mouth, both tightened a little by his service with the army, and if there is a poet in him it is as a Virginia farmer once told him, "a streak of something," perhaps indeed a part of that fundamental essence of Peter which calls him to a many-sided life.

As he looked at his own troubled face in the mirror the telephone bell rang.

"Are you there?" inquired the operator, using the conventional London phrase. "Right! Wait, please."

He heard a voice which came out of distance like a voice which comes nearer through a damp grove of dark green trees, like an aroma which comes forward on the wind, until it rose slowly to its full power. When the words were distinguishable he knew that some one was asking for him.

"Yes," said he, for the moment held enthralled by the warmth and rhythm of that voice.

Brena Selcross had come to find him. She had taken the initiative; she had come to London. He did not have to say, "Who is this?" She had come.

Something, however, in that phrase, "I must see you," said with intensity by that extraordinary woman, about whom the Benhams knew so little and perhaps Muriel so much, filled Peter for the moment with an inexplicable dread. This sudden chill of self-preservation was not founded upon the repulsion of that telephone. "I must see you," [illegible] and also [illegible] relief from a great anxiety [illegible] her expressive hands, interwoven [illegible] her fingers, free of all rings, and allowed her sounds to almost close. [illegible] I would have liked to stay longer."

Peter, conscious of his shrewdness, said exactly what she had said—nothing

[illegible] I can put an end to it is to be unfailing. The plain truth is that I do not feel the slightest emotion of any kind about Miss Benham. No doubt she is a very admirable English girl—[illegible] lovely and correct. No doubt there was an unfortunate misunderstanding, but it was not because of any indication of mine, and nothing need be said about it. I left Reconsurec Hodge because of it."

Brena sat back in her chair with a [illegible] as he explained to Peter to state,

[illegible]
