MR. ERICSSON'S CALORIC SHIP.—The following description of this new ship we take from the N. Y. Times. We have heretofore given a full account of the machinery:—

The Ericsson, taking the name of her inventor, is a first class vessel of the ordinary steamship pattern, though combining in her construction many valuable improvements. She is owned by a company of merchants in this city, among whom is Mr. John B. Kitching. The builders of her hull were Messrs. Perrine, Patterson and Stack, of Williamsburgh. Her engines are the workmanship of Messrs. Hogg & Delamater of this city. The register of the ship is 1,903 tons. Her length is 250 feet, with 26 feet 6 inches depth of hold, and 40 feet breadth of beam. Her paddle wheels, which are similar to those of the Collins steamers—differing only in being somewhat smaller—are 35 feet in diameter, with buckets of ten feet 6 inches. The decks are abundantly provided with life-boats, among which is one of Francis's celebrated "life cars," ready to be cast off from the davits at a moment's notice. The peculiar conformation of the boilers has served to produce very essential modifications in the exterior as well as the interior of the vessel, which we shall endeavor to describe as briefly as possible.

To commence, then with the upper deck. In place of the solitary smoke funnel commonly employed in the steamships to convey away the smoke and gases of the furnace, the caloric ship presents four small tubes, gaily painted in white and gold, rising but five feet above the paddle wheels, and only thirty inches each in diameter. Two of these tubes, or chimnies, are intended for use, and two are for ornaments and to preserve uniformity. The two corner chimneys are attached to the cylinders of the engine, and the remaining two protect the hold from the impure and heated air which would otherwise render a residence therein quite uncomfortable. By this arrangement also, and in consequence of the peculiar construction of the engines, the upper deck of the vessel is entirely clear. No impeding machinery serves to hinder free passage fore and aft.

The four chimneys, each resting upon a heatly carved and painted octagonal pedestal, are formed of sheet iron and two of wood. They are the only noticeable alterations in the exterior of the ship, save the unusual clearness and roominess of the deck, where the passenger may promenade. But the chimneys are not alone in their ventilating properties. Beside each pair of these pipes is a well, extending to the bottom of the ship, through which a current of cold air is carried down to the fire-room, rendering that place as cool and comfortable as the upper deck, and effectually preventing all danger of conflagration from overheating. The mouths of these "wells" are carefully covered with tarpaulins, and the room occupied is hardly equal to a hatchway. Through the open space thus afforded, an additional advantage is given for the working of the force pumps, the pipes of which are carried up through its entire length, projecting upon the upper deck in a manner very convenient for the seamen to work them to free the ship from water. The deck, accordingly, supplies three desiderata, viz: 1, ventilation of the hold; 2, safety from fire; 3, a means of preventing danger from leakage, by readiness of access to the pumps.

The decent from the upper deck is accomplished, not as in steamships, by impracticable ladders, but by neat staircases, for which ample space is afforded by the position of the engine-room. The peculiarities of construction of the vessel begin to appear in this region. The compact form of the engine leaves a free space on each side of the ship, from fore to aft, both above and below, thereby affording opportunities for easy transition between all parts of the vessel. The shaft which turns the paddle-wheels is concealed between decks, and offers no such obstruction to the midship section of the vessel as is generally to be found, even in first-class steamers. The dining saloons are located aft of the engine, and the state-rooms lie below, easy access to them being obtained by means of substantial and spacious stairways. The appointments of the saloons, state-rooms, and other parts of the vessel intended for the accommodation of passengers, are very perfect and expense has not been spared to render the Ericsson without a superior in these respects.

The construction of the furnaces, and the small amount of fuel required to feed them, causes a great saving in the stowage room of the vessel, by which it gains largely in accommodations for merchandise and freight. The freightage of the ship will be about 1,400 tons. The freight deck, strongly secured from accidents, is roomy and cleanly. It is perfectly clear from stem to stern, in consequence mainly of the small space occupied by the machinery of the ship, and affords, besides the freighting space proper, a considerable supply of store rooms and recesses, always useful for the stowage of precious articles. The coal hold is below the freight deck, and is abundantly spacious to contain the entire mass of fuel required for the outward and return voyages of the ship. It is, in fact, contemplated that the vessel will be able to carry her coals for the longest trips out and back; even should the voyage be extended beyond the customary route of our packet steamers.

The experiments already made with the engines of the new ship promise a very auspicious commencement of her career. The operations of the machinery, so far as the different portions have been tried, are perfectly smooth and accurate, and the revolutions of the wheels of the vessel have taken place with all the regularity and order which was to be expected of them. The prognostics of success are very promising. The public will await the result with eager interest. But one opinion can be expressed in regard to the probabilities of the plan. The necessity of a new motive power is every day more pressing. Advantages must be gained by the application of the leading principles of nature to new uses, and the inventor who shall accomplish this feat will entitle himself to the lasting gratitude of the commercial and travelling world. It is to be hoped, in view of the labor and ingenious resources which have been expended upon a project that seems so feasible as this, that the honor of the new motor may be finally awarded to the studies of Captain Ericsson.

From the Detroit Advertiser, Dec. 21.

THE NEW PADDLE-WHEEL.

Some few weeks ago we called the attention of our readers to the model of a new paddle wheel, which had been invented and constructed by Capt. Bury, of Grosse Isle. At that time the attention of several steamboat captains and owners in this city, were also directed to the invention, and among others Captain Ward—who, observing that it was at least worthy of a trial on a larger scale than of the model, allowed the inventor to construct a set of his paddles for one his smaller sized boats to test the operation of the invention.

The "Ruby" was at first intended for the experiment, but finding that if the paddles were to be applied to her he would have to wait till Spring for trial, Captain Bury had them cut down and made to fit the wheel of the "Telegraph." On Saturday we had the satisfaction of seeing the first trial of this new paddle-wheel.

The "Telegraph" ran about a mile and a half up the river and back, and the wheel with newly invented paddles was found to work most admirably. Among the gentlemen on board were Captain Ward, George Pomeroy, Esq., Thomas Miller, Esq., Horace Gray, Esq., and others. The wind at the time was blowing quite a gale up stream, creating considerable swell; but it did not affect the working of the wheel in the slightest degree.

It will be understood that the whole merit of the invention consists in the swinging paddle, which, the moment it leaves the water, falls back against the arm, and thus gets free from the lift of water to which the common paddles is liable, and also of the resistance which the air offers to the motion of its flat surface while out of the water, a force that is computed at one twenty eighth of the driving power.

The wheels of the Telegraph are about 18 feet in diameter, the arms 9 feet long, the paddle 4 feet 6 inches wide, and are driven by an engine of about 40 horse power, which, during the trial, made 20 revolutions per minute. It therefore tested the working of the invention pretty fairly. The paddles were found to work with great ease—each one as it struck the water falling into its place and communicating no jarring tremble to the boat. This was very perceptible when standing by the wheel with the common-paddles, where every time that the paddle struck the water a quivering could be distinctly felt. On the other hand the gradual entrance of the new paddles into the water caused by the angle at which they struck, caused no jar and there was consequently less strain to the timbers of the boat and the whole machinery; a decided improvement.

It was thought, also, that the motion of the new wheel caused much less swell in the water than the other; but of this no opinion could be formed—the surface of the river being too agitated.

That the paddle wheel constructed on this plan will work, is now unquestionable; and there is good reason to claim that it possesses a certain superiority to the common wheel in the following particulars:—

1st. Because it gets rid of the heavy lift of water immediately after passing through it.

2d. It passes through the air with little or no resistance.

3d. It takes hold of the water with more force than the common paddle.

4th. Its action is gradual in entering and coming out of the water, thus getting rid of the tremulous jar incident to the rapid motion of the common paddle.

5th. From these causes combined, it allows a much greater proportion of the power of the engine to be applied to the propulsion of the boat.

6th. It is simple in construction, and cannot readily be put out of working trim.

We are not prepared to say that it had no defects; but they will probably be such as an improved construction will quickly remedy.

The Telegraph is passing into new hands, and we believe the new owner is willing to have both wheels fitted with these paddles, and to run the boat between Cleveland and Port Stanley, on trial, while the lake is clear of ice. We hope to hear a good report from the experiment. The inventor thinks that these paddles will work equally as well in heavy seas as on rivers, and that in some respects they will be found superior to the common wheel. This is a matter which can only be settled after actual trial. In the meanwhile it is to be hoped that he will have the opportunity of testing his invention on a larger scale, and commend his invention to the notice of steamboat builders.
