WHITTIER TO COLFAX.

Colfax:—well chosen to preside
O'er Freedom's Congress, and to guide,
As one who holds the reins of fate,
The current of its swift debate;
Prompt by one impulse and one word
And—what is rarer—just and good,
Here, from our Northern river banks,
I send to you my hearty thanks
For all the guidance which has borne
The weary foot of Tankum's horn,
The mission of the oppressed
And Peel's incomparable words of lead!
Still wisely ready when the scale
Hangs poised to make the right prevail;
Still foremost, though Secession's head
Be crushed, with scornful heel to tread
The life out from its writhing tail!
As wise, firm, faithful to the end
God help thee, prays thy sincere friend.
JOHN G. WHITTIER.

A Good Story of Sir Matthew Hale.

A gentleman of considerable estate, residing in the eastern part of England, had two sons. The oldest being of a rambling disposition, went abroad. After several years his father died, when the younger son destroyed his will, and seized upon the estate. He gave out that his brother was dead, and bribed some false witnesses to attest the truth of it. In the course of time, the elder brother returned, and in miserable circumstances. His younger brother repulsed him with scorn—told him that he was an imposter, asserting that his brother was dead long ago, and he could bring witnesses to prove it. The poor fellow, having neither money nor friends, was in a most dismal situation. He went round the parish, making bitter complaints; and, at last, came to a lawyer, who, when he had heard the poor man's mournful story, undertook his cause, and entered an action against the younger brother, which was agreed to be tried at the next general assizes, at Chelmsford, in Essex.

The lawyer having engaged in the cause of the poor man, set his wits to work to counteract the powerful interest exerted against him. At last he hit upon the happy thought, that he would consult the first of all the judges, Lord Chief Justice Hale. Accordingly he flew up to London and laid open the cause in all its circumstances. The Judge heard the case patiently and attentively, and promised all the assistance in his power. With this object he contrived matters in such a manner, as to have finished all his business at the king's bench before the assizes began at Chelmsford. When his carriage had conveyed him down very near the seat of the assizes, he dismissed his man and equipage, and sought out a retired house. He found one occupied by a miller. After some conversation, and making himself quite agreeable, he proposed to the miller to change clothes with him, and, as the Judge had a good suit on, the man had no reason to object. Accordingly, the Judge put on a complete suit of the miller's best, and armed with a stick, away he marched to Chelmsford, procured lodgings to his liking, and waited for the assizes that were to begin the next day. When the trial came on he walked like an ignorant country fellow, backward and forward, along the county hall, and soon found out the poor fellow that was plaintiff. As soon as he came into the hall, the miller drew up to him: "My honest friend," said he "how is your case likely to go to-day?" Replied the plaintiff, "My cause is in a very precarious situation, and if I lose it I am ruined for life." "Well, here friend," replied the miller, "will you take my advice? I will let you into a secret, which perhaps you do not know; every Englishman has the right and privilege to except against any juryman, through the whole twelve; now do you insist upon your privilege, without giving a reason why, and I will do you all the service in my power." Accordingly, when the clerk of the court had called over the jurymen, the plaintiff excepted to one of them by name. The judge on the bench was highly offended with this liberty. "What do you mean," said he, "by excepting against that gentleman?" "I mean, my lord, to assert my privilege as an Englishman, without giving the reasons why." "Well sir," said the judge, who had been deeply bribed, "as you claim your privilege, who would you wish to have in the room of that man excepted against?" After a short time taken into consideration, "My lord," said he, "I wish to have an honest man chose in," and he looked around the court. "My lord, there is that miller in the court, we will have him if you please." Accordingly the miller was chose in. As soon as the clerk of the court had given them all their oaths, a little dexterous fellow came into the department, and slips ten golden caroluses into the hands of the eleven jurymen, but gave the miller but five. He observed that they were all bribed as well as himself, and to his next neighbor in a soft whisper, he said, "How much have you got?" "Ten pieces," said he. He concealed what he had himself. The cause was opened by the plaintiff's counsel, and all the scraps of evidence they could fish up were adduced in his favor.

The younger brother was provided with a great number of witnesses, all bribed as well as the judge. They deposed that they were in the self-same country when the brother died, and saw him buried. The counselors argued upon this accumulated evidence, and everything went with a full tide in favor of the younger brother. The judge said, "Gentlemen are you agreed, and who shall speak for you?" "We are agreed my lord," replied one, "our foreman shall speak for us." "Hold, my lord," replied the miller, "we are not all agreed." "Why," says the judge, in a very surly manner, "what's the matter with you? What reasons have you for disagreeing?" "I have several reasons, my lord," replied the miller. "The first is, they have given to all these gentlemen of the jury ten broad pieces of gold, and to me but five; besides, I have my objections to make to the false reasonings of the lawyers, and the extraordinary evidence of the witnesses." Upon this the miller began a discourse, that discovered such vast penetration of judgment, such extensive knowledge of law, and expressed with such energetic and manly eloquence, as to astonish the judge and the whole court. As he was going on with his powerful demonstration, the judge in surprise, stopped him. "Where did you come from and who are you?" "I came from Westminster Hall," replied the miller. "My name is Matthew Hale—I am Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench. I have observed the iniquity of your proceedings this day, and therefore come down from a seat you are unworthy to hold. You are one of the corrupt parties in this iniquitous business. I will come up this moment, and try the cause all over again." Accordingly, Sir Matthew went up, with the miller's dress and hat on, began with the trial from its very origin; searched every circumstance to truth and falsehood; proved the elder brother's title to the estate, and gained a complete victory in favor of truth and justice.

Information has been received at Washington that the Provisional Government of Crete has decided to convoke a regular Parliament. Elections are taking place in all parts of the island. The members elect will hold their first session at Canea, the capital of Crete. Another battle took place on the 3d inst., near Schatz, during which the Cretans drove the Turks from two blockhouses which they built only recently for their entrenchment.

NARROW ESCAPE.

FROM THE HOME JOURNAL.

In a private letter from a distinguished lady correspondent, we find the relation of one of the most thrilling incidents we have ever met with in romance or in history; and acting upon the discretionary power our fair friend has given us, we lay the little drama before our readers, suppressing the name of its heroine only here.

Capt. H. of the English Navy, had been spending a few days in London on his return from the station. The crew of his vessel had been paid off at Deptford, and having spent with a friend the preceding evening, the day fixed for his departure for Plymouth, where his family resided, he had started to return to his lodgings at an advanced hour of the night. The moon was beautifully clear, the air sharp and bracing; and thinking over his plans for the morrow, Captain H. was walking briskly, when his attention was attracted by the sight of a female, elegantly dressed, standing at the door of a handsome house. He was passing on, however, when she came hastily up to him, and addressing him as "Captain," desired he would step in for a moment, as she had something to communicate to him. The woman was singularly beautiful, her language refined, and her dress extremely elegant. Sailors are not apt to be over scrupulous, and H. was not proof against the temptation. He entered the house, ascended the stairs and followed his fair conductress into what appeared to be, by the light of the moon streaming in at the window, a large and well furnished apartment. "Pray be seated," said she, "I will return immediately with a light." As she closed the door, H. thought he heard her turn the key. He took little notice of this seemingly trifling incident, but ascribed it to her fear of his leaving the room before she returned, and amused himself in the meanwhile by examining the contents of the apartment. Facing the windows stood a French beadstead. He approached it, and mechanically threw open the curtains that neatly concealed it. The opera air he was humming died on his lips, and the warm blood curdled in his veins, at the sight that met his horror-struck gaze. The bright beams of the moon shone full on the body of an officer attired in his regimentals, and whose throat was cut from ear to ear! The blood was fresh, and still streaming from the hideous gash, and the eyes wide open, and glaring upwards. He stood petrified for a few moments, at length, summoning resolution, he stretched out his hand, and touched the face of the corpse; the body was still warm! The truth flashed on his mind—the girl had locked him in, and was gone for officers of the police to arrest him, for the deed she had doubtless herself committed. He rushed to the door, and set all the strength of a desperate man to force it open; but it resisted his efforts. What should he do? Time was flying fast, and the next moment might see him thrown into prison, and awaiting the ignominious sentence which would doom him to the death of a felon. Appearances would inevitably condemn him, and as these thoughts rose up before him, though a man of noted intrepidity, his presence of mind seemed totally to fail him in this great emergency. In a state of mind bordering on distraction, he threw open the window, and measured the distance to the ground. The room was situated in the second story, and death seemed inevitable if he adopted that mode of escape; still, death, and what was far worse, disgrace awaited him if he remained, and goaded by this dreadful idea, he sprung into the street below. Strange to say he alighted on his feet totally unharmed. Scarce pausing to congratulate himself on his good fortune, he dashed forward with the speed of a deer, and never stopped to take breath until he reached his lodgings. On the following day he started for Plymouth, vowing to observe more prudence in future, ere he accepted the invitations of unknown women. Some days after he read in the London papers an account of the murder, and the testimony of the girl, accusing a man of doing the deed, who had probably made his escape during her absence. The sequel of the affair never came to his ears, as he again left England a short time after: but he kept his own counsel, and never mentioned his narrow escape for some years when he related it to a relation of mine, from whom I in turn had the story.

Extraordinary Escape.

A most remarkable escape from a position of fearful peril occurred at the Clifton Paper Mill, carried on by Messrs. King & Hagar, on Saturday last. The circumstances, as we learn them from Colonel David King, were substantially these: "A boy named Brofe, about ten years of age, was engaged in rolling paper around a horizontal shaft, when the sleeve of his right arm was caught by the shaft, and he was hurled around it, fortunately not with extreme velocity, as the shaft was turning at a moderate speed.

Close to the shaft was a horizontal wooden roller resting on bearings, and the boy's feet, as he was drawn under the shaft, struck this roller and hurled it about ten feet through the air. It struck a young man, who was at work in the room, on the side of the head, knocking him to the floor insensible. The fireman was also in the room, and hastened to the shaft to throw it out of gear; but, as he came near, the boy's feet struck him on the head, and he too was knocked down. Not being injured, however, he immediately gathered himself up and succeeded in stopping the shaft. The boy was extricated, and was found not to be dangerously hurt. One of his arms was badly wrenched, and he is otherwise bruised so that he will doubtless be laid up for some time. None of the other parties were seriously injured. The escape of the boy from death (he was taken from the shaft within eight inches from the post which supported it at one end) was little short of miraculous.—Springfield (O.) Republic.

THE GERMAN POLAR EXPEDITION.—The German expedition to the North Pole, the cost of which is estimated at 15,000 thalers, (72½ cents each,) will definitely leave Bergen, Norway, on the 15th inst. The greater part of the crew have already quitted Hamburg for that port. The vessel which Mr. Coveldog, the leader, has purchased there, is one of those new Danish yachts specially constructed for Polar voyages. It is furnished with beams and iron plates in a way to augment its powers of resistance. The name is Germania, and the flag of the Northern Confederation will be displayed. It measures eighty tons, and will have a crew of twelve or fourteen men.
