The Pittsburgh Gazette.

THE HOT SEASON.

BY DR. O. W. HOLMES.

The folks that on the first of May
Wore under-coats and back,
Began to fry, the first of June.
"Good Lord! how hot it grows!"
As last two Fahrenheits blew up,
And killed two children small,
And one barometer shot dead
A tutor with its ball.

Now all day long, the locusts' song
Among the leaves shakes irons,
Three new heels warped inside out,
Their pumps could only wheeze!
And ripe old wine that twenty years
Had cobwebbed o'er in vain,
Came spouting through the rotten cakes
Like Joly's best champagne!

The Worcester locomotives did
Their trips in half an hour;
The Lowell cars ran forty miles
Before they checked their power;
Roll brimstone soon became a drug,
And loco-foco fell;
All asked for ice, but everywhere
Saltpetre was to sell.

Plump men of mornings ordered tights,
But eves the scorching noons,
Their candle moulds had grown so loose
As Cossack pantaloons!
The dogs ran mad—men could not try
If water they would choose;
A horse fell dead—he only left
Four red-hot, rusty shoes.

But soon the people could not bear
The slightest hint of fire;
Allusions to calorific grew
A flood of savage ire;
The lexicon heat were all torn out
From every book at school,
And many blackguards kicked and cuffed
Because they said, "Keep cool."

The fastight companies were mobbed,
The bakers all were shot,
The penny press began to talk
Of lynching Doctor Nott;
And all about the warehouse steps
Were angry men in droves,
Cursing and spitting through the doors,
To smash the patent stoves.

The abolition men and maids
Were tanned to such a hue—
You scarce could tell them from their friends
Unless their eyes were blue;
And, when I left, society
Had burst its ancient guards,
And Winnetic street and Temple Place
Were interchanging cards.

COULDN'T AFFORD TO MARRY.

It was noticed among the friends of Mr. George Lane that, for some cause unknown to them, a somber hue had fallen on his thoughts.

The reason was inferred, and correctly. Arrows from a pair of bright eyes had wounded him, and the pain found no abatement night or day. Was the maiden coy or unkind? No—the maiden was familiar and tender. There was healing in the eyes that shot forth arrows.

And the pain found no abatement night or day? None! George Lane was no blind lover, ready to risk all consequences in pursuit of any object—but a sensible young man, who counted the cost. This was the reason of his trouble. Love is sweet; but life is a thing of sober earnest, and as George put the love and life together, taking things as they were, he could not see how love was to leave any permanent sweetness.

An intimate friend holding him by the hand one day said:

"George, my dear fellow, what has come over you? I don't believe you have smiled for a month. Are you in love?

"Yes," was the frank reply.

"Aha! a sickness of the mind. Well, I'm glad to know it's nothing more serious. Love wounds to heal. If, as the poet says:

"Keen transport throbs through every vein,"

it is also true that we never know

"The sweet a pain."

"There is no sweetness in my case," said the young man. "The pain is sharp, and there was no medicine on the arrow point."

"Then the maiden is unkind?"

"No."

"She loves you in return?"

"If I have any skill in reading eyes."

"What, then? Are her parents unwilling?"

"I have never asked them."

"You are a strange lover to look so woe-be-gone. Where rests the trouble?"

"There is much beyond love," said Lane.

"Yes."

"Marriage and cost of living."

"True. But you have a good salary. Has the young lady nothing?"

"She has a father who is doing an excellent business; but the family live at an expense which must cover, if not more than exhaust, all the profits."

"Who is the young lady? I will not betray your confidence."

"The youngest daughter of Abraham West."

"Hardware merchant?"

"The same."

"I know her, and a sweet girl she is, Nellie West. Why, George, she's the very one for you. And you have favor in her eyes! I congratulate you."

"You needn't then," was the sombre-faced reply of Lane, "for I am not witless enough to bare my neck to the halter of matrimony, if the act is to bind me to a perpetual sentence."

"What do you mean?"

"Simply, that the manner in which Mr. West has raised his daughters unfits them for the position of wives to young men of my condition. They have the education; the tastes and the accomplishments we desire and must have; but their habits and expectations are fatal dowries for any poor young man to accept. They have no fortune to bring their husbands, and yet must be supported in comparative elegance. The idea of useful employment does not seem to have entered their minds. Work, in their view, involves something of degradation. Ah, well I must dismiss a fore illusion that was sweet while it lasted. I shall go no farther in this unsafe direction. Some other man, bolder, or less inclined to count the cost, must win consent from a heart it would be a life long happiness to call my own."

"Nonsense, George," replied the friend. "If the young lady really loves you, she will adapt herself to your circumstances. Nellie is a charming girl. Press your suit, and after gaining her consent, talk over life's sober realities with her. She has sense and right feeling, will readily comprehend how much of happiness is involved in your prudential ideas. A woman who loves a man well enough to marry him, will cheerfully accommodate herself to his circumstances."

"Accommodate!" said the young man curling his lips. "I don't like the word. It hurts my pride."

"Pride is never a good counsellor, friend George."

"My manhood, then. It hurts my manhood. A young woman without a dollar in the world, 'accommodate' herself to the circumstances of a young man whose income is twelve hundred a year! You can't reconcile me to the case under that plea. My pride, manliness, self love, or self-esteem—as you will—revolts against the humiliation. No, no—George Lane has independence as well as prudence, and thinks their counsels worth heeding."

"While I think," answered the friend, "that George Lane is a little too high strung for the case under consideration, I know Nellie very well, and think her a sensible girl. True, the way in which her parents have conducted her home education is not favorable to just views in life. But love is clear-sighted and strong-hearted. Take her out of her present false relation to society, and she will make you, I am sure, a good wife in every respect."

"No, sir," was firmly answered. "Even as I talk with you, and listen to what you say, I grow more resolute in my purpose to recede from a dangerous position. If Nellie was alone in the world I might act differently. But look at the case as it stands, and see what risks are involved. There are two older sisters both married; and their husband's noses, to use a homely phrase, are well down upon the grindstone and likely to remain there. Already both have gone through the ordeal of a fall in business—and no wonder.

"Not being able as clerks to maintain their domestic establishments, they were foolish enough to set up in imitation of other people as silly as themselves; they must have stores of their own, from the income of which they drew with such unscrupulous hands, that more than all the profits were consumed in fast living."

"Somehow or other, in their break down they have managed to keep their fine furniture and houses, and still live before the world in what to me is shameless extravagance. Both are clerks again; but how they manage to keep up appearances as they do, passes my comprehension. I have met their wives a few times at Mr. West's, and they hold their heads as high as queens. I am nobody in their estimation! Why, the jewelry, lace, and other showy things that they flaunt in people's eyes so shamelessly—seeing that somebody besides their husband's have actually paid for them—cost more than a third of my year's salary—"

"But you have nothing to do with these ladies," interrupted the friend.

"True, and I don't mean to have anything to do with them. But the case would have another bearing were I a brother-in-law. I would not have their bad influences operating on my wife. She must have as costly outfitting as they. She must have a fine house to live in, and as fine furniture to display to her friends; and my nose must come down to a grindstone, like the noses of their unfortunate husbands. I've gone over the matter twenty times or more, and can see it no different. It won't do, and there is no use in trying to harmonize things that are utterly incongruous."

"Take another view. Suppose Nellie came into my views of these things, and turned herself away from all these allurements. Suppose we, like sensible people, lived below our income, and set ourselves to make provision for a time when expenses would be greater; I would gradually accumulate; set up business, perhaps, and rise into a position of some influence in the way of money matters. Then I must consent to be ruined, or written down as a miser and a churl by the whole family. Paps lives on the extension principle, just making both ends meet, as I infer. Well, tight times come every now and then. He has failed once in his life and may fail again. When the strain equals resistance, a slight increase of force snaps shafts of timber. If paps gets in trouble, and son-in-law is all right, son-in-law must go to the rescue, sink or swim. It won't answer, you see. I've counted the cost, and think it too great, have looked over the hedge before leaping, and am afraid of the ditch on the other side."

"I see how it is," answered the friend, "you have large caution."

"Am I not right?"

"Perhaps so. But lovers, whose hearts are as much interested as yours seems to be, are not apt to throw prudential reasons of this character in the way of their happiness. They are usually inclined to take counsel of love alone."

"I have seen pictures of love blindfolded, but I think love a false god."

"As you will," said the friend. "But this I know; if my heart were interested in Nellie, I would never abandon her on the plea that you have advanced; at least not before I was well assured that the false life, which by a kind of domestic necessity she has thus far led, had so fostered pride and vanity as to deprave her understanding. Be assured, George, that in this you sin not against your own heart, but the maiden's!"

"I spent an evening with her last week," he replied. "I went with my mind more than half made up to let my lips betray my feelings. It so happened that she was not alone. A young lady was her guest; a very sprightly, outspoken, critical, rather sharp-tongued girl of eighteen or twenty—smart enough for twenty, and thoughtless enough for sixteen. People and things were talked about with a flippancy and freedom neither charitable nor delicate. Among other subjects, the marriage of a friend was discussed, and the well or ill of the case settled in a manner that made my cheek burn."

"I never thought Amy the simpleton to get married in that mean sort of a way," remarked the young lady. "She must have wanted a husband! If a man cannot do better by me than that, I'd advise him to give my door a wide birth."

"Nellie laughed at her friend, and returned a few assenting words that stung me to the quick. The present of a ring by the young husband was remarked upon. Nellie said it was an emerald, but her friend pronounced it a green glass, adding that nothing but a diamond would have suited her ideas. I waited in uncomfortable suspense for Nellie's response. It came in these words, "Nothing but diamonds for me."

"Thoughtlessly said, George!" remarked his friend. "You take too seriously the light speeches of girls, who often talk without thinking, just to hear themselves talk."

"If it were jesting," answered Lane, "the subject was unfortunate at the time. But this was not all. My ears were quick; and I took in every inflection of voice. Nellie said many other things connected with the subject of their young friend's marriage to a poor young man, who could not afford her a respectable place in society, that it would be folly for me to forget. When I left her house that evening, I drew a veil over her image in my heart, and I have tried not to lift that veil since. The pain it is costing me I have not been able entirely to conceal, as witness your observation of a change in my appearance. But I am strong enough to do what reason tells me is right. No word or intimation of what is in my heart have I passed to the young lady, so that I can turn from her without dishonor. Heaven send her a happy lot in life!"

The voice of George Lane faltered a little on the closing sentence. He was fully in earnest, as shown by his subsequent conduct. More deeply than he had imagined was the heart of Nellie interested, as her face, dreamy eyes, and quiet manner long afterwards witnessed. But he did not return. Two years afterwards she married, beginning life with a young husband just in business, who drew from his light capital $2,000 to furnish his house in style suited to the social grade in which she had been moving. In three years extravagant living had consumed more than all he was worth, and under the pressure of a "tight money market," he failed and was sold out by the sheriff, Nellie being forced to go back with her two children, to her father's house. The husband, in a fit of desperation, went to California, and died from sickness and exposure among the mines.

In the meantime George Lane, who could never obliterate Nellie's image from his heart, continued to live a single life. He was now in business, and gradually accumulated property. The death of her husband, and in a few months afterwards the death of her father, awakened anew his interest. He knew she was poor and dependent; and he learned incidentally, with pain, that since her father's death she was living in the house of a brother-in-law who was not able to support his own family. That one still dear to him should be thus dependent, and as he felt, humiliated, hurt the young man. He could not bear the thought, and began turning over in his mind one suggestion of means after another, looking to her relief. But her considerations of delicacy and propriety were in the way. He felt that he could do nothing.

One morning, he met her in the street. He was walking with his eyes on the pavement, thinking of Nellie, when looking up suddenly, he saw her at a distance approaching. She was poorly clad, and had a bundle on her arm, which Lane recognized at a glance as work from a clothing store.

Their eyes met and rested on each other; Lane made a motion as if he was about to speak; but Nellie dropped her veil over her face and moved on, with a quicker pace. Ere the veil fell he saw an expression in her eyes, and on her changed and wasted countenance, that filled his heart with the tenderest and saddest feelings. What a history of suffering was revealed!

The rest need not be told. If Nellie lost her lover when skies were bright, she found him when the rain was falling into the dark days of her life, and when painful experience had made her vision clear.

On the lover's conduct in turning from Nellie in her sunny days we give no opinion. We only record the fact, and give the reason. Inferences and opinions are with the reader—and the lesson also.

Is eminently adapted for our large western rivers, with spans of 500 feet, 80 feet above low water. It will resist the strongest winds, hurricanes, and the heaviest loaded trains will not affect it. I made the discovery on the 25th of June last. A model 6 feet long I exhibit, and give specification on its principles to all parties, who ask, an interest in bridges, and charge 25 cents.
