GREAT SCARCITY OF RAIN.

The Woods Are So Dry That Hunters Can't Get Near the Pheasants.

During the long drouth the Pennsylvania road is seriously embarrassed for water in the rural districts. The tanks at Jeannette, Radibaugh, Irwin and the County Home are empty. It is necessary to run a water train daily to supply the Jeannette tank. The officials are afraid the dry spell will continue until the winter comes, when it will be impossible to get water. There is a good supply in the mountains, but it is full of sulphur, and track tanks can't be laid without changing the grade of the road.

Not only are the officials of railways complaining about the scarcity of rain, but the plaint of the hunters is heard throughout the State about the same thing. Old nimrods say they never knew the woods and fields to be so dry. It is impossible on account of the crackling noise to creep within gunshot of pheasants. The wily birds are on the alert, and instinct tells them that they are in great demand for dinners just now. At the slightest sound of danger they are off for a place of safety. The crop of quail promises to be large, and this affords the boys some comfort. The woods appear to be full, and as soon as the days of grace fixed by law have expired they will be in great demand.
