Agricultural.

Manure and Fertilizers.

No farmer is unmindful of the value of manure, or of the importance of making as much as possible from his stock and by composts. Yet few of our best agriculturists are satisfied as to the most available method of applying their manures or fertilizers. They may be applied both in liquid and solid form; the first having the advantage of producing early and quick effect, and thus returning a profit in the shortest possible time.—But American farmers have not used liquid manures to any great extent; perhaps experimenting in the garden, or occasionally on the flower bed.—Near large cities, where land is dear, and the productions bring a high market price, there can be little doubt of liquid fertilizers being by far the best and cheapest. Solid manure, from the barnyard or from the compost heap, have the advantage of less preparation; they also afford a larger variety of ingredients and are generally more durable than the fertilizers of commerce.

All kind of manure should be protected from the weather, either in sheds or underground stables. No intelligent man will question this.—If left out for the rain and sunshine to act upon, it will lose much of its value. The soluble ingredients will be worked away by water or the ammonia escape by evaporation. Fermented manures are always wasting away by volatile action, and unless protected from the weather, or composted with other substances, the ammonia will certainly escape. We frequently see this proved in the application of fertilizers to the surface of land, in top-dressing and broadcast manuring. Guano and superphosphate, in our judgment, should be plowed under, rather than left on the surface.

It is a nice point to understand what fertilizers are best adapted to certain soils. Some require mineral ingredients, some lime and plaster, others the lighter manures, like guano and the different phosphates. Bone dust has a powerful effect on nearly all soils; and when pure, is one of our cheapest and most durable fertilizers. In process of time, all soils change their character to a certain extent; some by having their natural constituents abstracted by plants; others by extra feeding and occasional fallowing.

Cheese Factories and their Influence on Farming.

The introduction of cheese factories into our farming communities has benefited not only their stockholders, who have found that they return good dividends, but the whole farming community, and we are glad to see that their number is likely to be largely increased this season. It is something new in farming experience to have it stated how much milk it takes to make a pound of cheese, what is the actual cost per pound, and what is the net profit of the season's product, as was done at the recent convention of the cheese factory proprietors at Worchester; but now that it is found that figures can be applied to farming as well as other employments, farmers will be stimulated to find out the cost of other crops, and determine whether they are profitable or otherwise by a strict debt and credit account, instead of the guess-work that is usually considered to be sufficiently accurate for the farmer. Thus all farmers cannot fail to be benefitted, whether cheese-makers or not.

The dairy interests of New England, however, these institutions offer the most direct and appreciable advantages. Farmers will appreciate, as they never have before, that it costs no more to keep a good cow than a poor one, while the profit is much greater, and they will set to work at once to improve their stock. It will be important, too, that farmers in the vicinity of these factories shall keep as many cows as possible, and improvement in farms will be the result. It will be some time probably before dairy farms here are brought to the perfection reached in Cheshire, the famous dairy county of England, where pastures are brought to such a state of fertility, by under-draining and top-dressing with bones, that one acre of pasturage only is allowed to a cow; but our farmers will approximate nearer and nearer to that standard till the old fashioned pastures, that have made so many youthful legs ache in hunting for the cows, will be known only in history. The relative value and proper quantities of winter food will also be determined with accuracy, and the product of the farm in hay, oats or grain increased accordingly. By far the larger portions of New England are better adapted to grazing and the dairy than any other branches of farming; and there is no question but that there will be profit in the development of this interest to its fullest extent. That cheese factories are having a most favorable effect on this development must be evident to the most casual observer; and we shall be glad to see them a good deal more plenty than they are. It is much more difficult to get good butter than good cheese, and those who have it to sell never have to go begging for a purchaser.—Springfield Republican.

GRAHAM PUDDING.—Stir Graham flour gradually into boiling water with a little salt, and make about as thick as hasty pudding, or mush, and free from lumps. Eat with tolerably rich milk and sugar, and with the addition of canned peaches or other preserved fruits. If there be any of the pudding left over it may be cut in slices and fried in lard or dripping, and is very good.

RHUBARB PUDDING.—One cup sour milk, one teaspoonful soda, make a stiff batter with flour, and add some cropped stalks of pie plant. Boil in cloth and serve with cream and sugar for dinner.

RECENTLY a Connecticut farmer's wife, noted for a keen eye to the finances, was told by her husband that the church had elected him deacon, whereupon she eagerly inquired, "How much money will you get by it?"

THE following toast is given by an exchange: "Woman—The morning star of infancy—the day star of manhood—the evening star of age. Bless our stars."
