Spring Sowing of Corn.

A correspondent of the Journal of the Farm writes from Glenn Mills, Pa., as follows: During the Summer Season, or beginning of Autumn, we seldom escape more or less drought, sometimes, as during the latter part of August, 1869, it is so serious as materially to injure the pasturage, and to occasion a great reduction in the amount of milk and butter. During the trying portion of last year, I was much pleased to see that numbers of farmers in this neighborhood, had had sufficient foresight greatly to diminish the evil. This was accomplished by the Spring-sowing of Indian Corn, to be cut while green and given to the cows. Some persons sowed the corn thickly, others drilled it in; the latter having the advantage of working with a cultivator while young, lessening the weeds, keeping the ground in better condition, and producing a heavier crop. What anxiety may be prevented by this prudent management, and how greatly it adds to the comfort of cattle at a time when the grass is so dried, that it burns like tinder on the application of fire. Some seasons the rains are supplied so regularly, that the pasture does not fail until the approach of winter. When we are so favored the green corn may remain uncut till the failure of grass from frost, and then be used for soiling, or it may be cut, dried, and kept for winter, when it will be found much more nourishing for the cows than fodder from corn, which has ripened the grain. The usual quantity for sowing broadcast is from 3 to 4 bushels; drilled in, half that amount will suffice. Farmers who have tried this method of keeping up their supply of milk and butter, during the scorching heat of summer, or after Autumn frosts have diminished the crop of grass, I think will never again depend upon uncertain pasture. The amount of land and seed required is certainly insignificant, compared with the return which it affords, to say nothing of the feeling of satisfaction which it produces, to see animals secure from the misery of a short allowance of food. It will be a very great improvement in American husbandry when the cattle shall not only be supplied liberally during the grazing season with green food for soiling, but also with a sufficiency of roots, beets, carrots, turnips, to alternate with the dry food of winter. B.

Hill and Drill Corn.

Among the experiments tried during the year by Prof. Daniels, on the Experimental Farm of the University of Wisconsin, were some to test the comparative methods of hill and drill planting of corn, both for grain production and when designed for forage. Corn planted in hills yielded 5.4 per cent. less than in drills. The general appearance of that in hills was much the best, however, the ears being larger and filled better at the tips. That in hills had 10.9 per cent. In the experiments with corn as a forage crop, equal quantities of land were sown broadcast and planted in drills, three and one-half feet apart; seven bushels of seed to the acre being used in each case. That planted in drills gave the best forage and the greatest amount. In another experiment eleven bushels per acre were sown broadcast, and seven planted in drills. In this case the broadcast sowing gave the largest yield. Prof. Daniels remarks, in his report, that one reason broadcast sowing requires more seed is that all the seed is not covered, and birds and grasshoppers carry off much that is uncovered. He suggests as a better method for those having grain drills that they sow nine bushels to the acre, using each third tooth of the drill.

Comfortable Stalls for Cattle.

One of the most disagreeable chores a farmer boy has to do is to sit down to milk a stable cow. He feels cross and so does the animal, and the consequence is he does not get a full flow of milk, and she is gradually dried up.

To make your cow stable comfortable put down a two inch plank where their hind feet stand, putting an inch strip under the edge of it towards the cow's head so as to give it an inclination toward the aisle or walk. Now fill the space from this plank to the forward part of the stall with sawdust or similar material to a depth of about four inches—a level with the upper edge of the plank. By this arrangement the excrement and urine are mostly dropped behind the plank in the walk, leaving a high, a dry and warm bed for the animal.

It is as easy for her feet as though she stood upon the soil of mother earth—as warm a bed as known to a human being.

I have had the fixtures in use about a month, and to-day the hams and flanks of my cows and calves are as clean and dry as in the summer. About once a week there needs an addition of sawdust to the bed. Just the comfortable looks of the cattle in evening when they are reposing upon their comfortable bed is worth many times the cost of the fixture.—Western Farmer.

CONSTIPATED CATTLE.—H. Narsh, Paulding county, Ohio, writes the Rural that his experience has taught him that, from one-quarter to one-half pound each of common salt and Epsom salts, will save hundreds of cattle's lives that annually die from constipation or dried up "manifold." if given in time. He has given this dose but once to cows that had passed bloody urine fæces for several days, and it operates quickly and thoroughly as a physic, and the patient soon recovers. He adds: "I believe that many cattle are supposed to have bloody murrain when they pass bloody urine and discharges, when the only trouble is the "manifold" has become so dry that there is no passage through them; then a thorough purging would bring them all right. Cattle will lick up the salt readily when given them.

BURNT SUGAR OR CARAMEL.—Take one teaspoonful and a half of white sugar, and put it into a ladle over the fire and stir with a wooden spoon. When the sugar is black, add of water one gill and a half; let it cool, strain and keep in a bottle. It is used for coloring soup, gravy, and other dishes, and can be put in cream to color it.

GOOD MILK TOAST.—Brown the bread nicely and thoroughly, while hot put on a little butter, and a very little salt, then place in a deep dish and pour over the whole boiling hot, sweet milk.

NOT WHAT WE OWN, but that which we can rationally enjoy, constitutes our real wealth.
