Agricultural.

[For the REPORTER].

Cattle in the Highway.

MR. EDITOR—Dear Sir: The REPORTER has an Agricultural Department, which is certainly a good feature, as its circulation is chiefly among farmers; and as the farmers of Bradford county, as a class, will compare favorably with those of like calling in other sections, we think they should contribute an occasional article to their column of the paper, thus diffusing useful information, while contributing their mite towards elevating and dignifying their vocation. With this end in view, we propose, with your consent, to say a few words on the above subject.

We have been talking about dignity, and now, Mr. Editor, we would ask you what is more mean, sordid, selfish or undignified, than for one to systematically permit the running of his hogs, sheep or cattle in the public highway? Such a course of conduct we deem a violation of common decency and common law. We say common decency, for by such a course of conduct, one, by endangering the lives and property of the traveling public, renders himself or his stock a public nuisance; for one can receive nothing that will so frighten a horse as the sudden starting up of a hog or sheep from the roadside. Who is there but can recall instances in which people have been injured in this manner? There is, however, an express statute prohibiting the very thing of which we complain. The law-making powers in all civilized countries, from time immemorial, have legislated more or less upon this very subject. In the winter of 1861, the Legislature of Pennsylvania passed a local law for Bradford county, making it (the running of stock at large) an offense, punishable with not only a fine, but if we mistake not, with imprisonment also. This, if not now a misdemeanor, it should certainly made such. The time only Legislature would thus amend, would be much better occupied than in passing laws for the benefit of railroad companies and other corporations.

We are happy, Mr. Editor, for our credit as a community, that the thing about which we complain, is not a common practice in this section. Public opinion scans the act against such conduct, though some still practice it nevertheless. To the objection of such we now propose to reply.

Says one: "Does not the grass on my side of the road, and along my premises belong to me?" Admitting that it does, do not you acknowledge yourself to be, if not a thief, at least a trespasser, whenever you permit your stock to have free range on both sides of said road, and along other people's property? Says another, in excuse: "We would not permit it, but our stock must have water, and we have none in our fields." Plausible enough! but could you not drive your cattle to and from water, once or twice a day? A farmer who can find time for that, had better [illegible] business.

In conclusion, we would call upon our citizens everywhere, to see that the laws on this subject are enforced. Let this "relic of barbarism" be [illegible] from among us.

GRAZIER.

Winter Care of Stock.

[illegible] comes to us with its storms and its chilliness, so painful to all kinds of stock exposed to it; shivering, [illegible] through its flesh, and [illegible] long at a disadvantage in [illegible] quarters. The season [illegible] upon herbage [illegible] too short for Winter feeding, and early growth in the Spring, and meadows are called on to supply what is considered a [illegible] for wire fodder provided. Winter fodder should be let instead, [illegible] stalks, pumpkins, potatoes, [illegible] respective of the scarcity, [illegible] critical time—pasture [illegible] changed, storms superseding [illegible] up to follow in [illegible] necessitates of Winter. It is [illegible] always to begin Winter [illegible] early, saving the meadows and pastures not only what they afford as [illegible] an early start in the Spring, but to prevent trampling, [illegible] more than is generally supposed. The rains will not [illegible] the grass lands; the [illegible] injure them materially, especially [illegible], and they are also more [illegible] by the weather. A milch cow in the rain, and with snow melting upon her! How often is this [illegible] treatment seen? Is it a wonder that cows fall off in milk, and in flesh? The difference is seen at once. Pass through the country, and it will be found that this prevails to a great extent. This wretched [illegible] is brutal.

If these are stables, why not have the cows in them as well as out in the rain, or in the chilly air? Is it cruelty, laziness or habit? Or what [illegible]? There is a scarcity of feed; and suffering in every storm is so much food thrown away, not measured, but it might have no effect thus [illegible].

And are our stables better than outdoors? We are constrained from what we see to ask this question. Cattle we have known to refuse to enter their stalls, while others have begged for entrance. Rigid confinement, a hard, uneven floor (we have seen it frequently), with a wallowing in the dirt of the stable, and then [illegible] the shivering, freezing cold—our stable being nearly as cold as the air without—with no chance to escape, but having to stand to it—this is not encouraging to a cow, and [illegible] milk at the time! Better be in the open air, subject to the mildness of the weather. Both are [illegible] by many farmers.

A warm shed, open at one place [illegible] enough for ingress and egress, is a better place for stock than is generally thought by rigid disciplinarians, who favor the confinement system. We can bring to mind not a few such cases where a shed closely boarded and ceiled, with fodder overhead, the opening to the East or South, afforded a comfort that it is a pleasure to think of. The place was warm, made warmer by the stock, well bedded, and well aired (by the door) without overmuch circulation; thus comfortable in the coldest weather, and in storms of course, a perfect protection. But your stock must not be crowded. We have had occasion in our earlier experience, to part with the most unruly members, and thus found all peaceful and harmonious. Racks for feeding were [illegible]. Placing the racks of the feeding place of space, as the cattle [illegible] to have their manger [illegible] road for eating [illegible] and this removed [illegible] the uppermost heap thus being made, when saved well the substance of the manure, and readily converted the straw into the same. In this way stock was kept clean, healthy and in good condition. Early, when storms prevailed, it was brought to the barn, and at once knew its place and took advantage of it, and no labor, no trouble, only to feed, carry the stalks and the chaff, and the best straw on the rack. Here also pumpkins were fed.

On the opposite side of the barn was the sheep shed, similar to the one for cattle, in every respect. And here all of the sheep were brought when the equinoctial and other storms came on, and they were kept as summer made them with plenty of good clover hay and other small feed, clover not being cut then as now (when in bloom), with all its substance available, and thus being sufficient as a sole feed, when yet green.

Calves, like sheep and cows, should be by themselves. Give them warmer stables. Of course, give them the freedom of the place, as there is no danger of their hurting one another. They will thrive on tender hay and pure water alone, if they are not previously kept out and pelted by the storms. If lacking in flesh, a little meal, barley and oats mixed is excellent, and will soon get up activity and roundness of flesh. Keep the calves growing through the winter.

Have we advised the shed system? We have presented it. The negligent farmer, if he adopts it, will do so with advantage—and so will the advocate of extreme confinement, where the discomforts, as we have mentioned, are greater than the exposure to the free sky. Let us reason; let us consider a brute an animal, akin to us in wants, as it is, and then let us work from priciples.—Country Gentleman.
