trappings we heard an unintelligible announcement traveling from voice to voice, up the broad stairways, which, when it reached the anteroom, caused a great commotion. Some of the lackeys ran one way, some ran another, and some ran out. A large party of my country-folk entered the antechamber, and as some of them were rich, young and handsome, I imagined with republican simplicity that my American friends were sufficiently distinguished to command this attention. So I began to plume myself thereupon; for did I not stand near the roses and consequently entitled to some of the perfume of distinction? But my rabed plumes were soon drooping when the cause of the flurry—the Hat—appeared.

It entered in all its scarlet glory, borne by two "Jeames Scarlet-plushes," on a gold palanqueen or waiter. I had become quite well acquainted with it in the morning, for it had been carried to and fro several times before my balcony on this very golden salver, so I recognized it instantly.

The Cardinal, escorted by Monsignor Cataldi, the Pope's Master of Ceremonies—the inevitable attendant on all the religious pomps and vanities of the Papal Court—meet the Pope's Major Domo and it at the grand entrance. Then they went in line state—Hat and all—to the salon of ceremony, where the Pope's messenger delivered a pretty speech in choice Italian. In it he told the Cardinal and us all secrets of good things about His Eminence, and then presented the Hat.

While this was going on a pretty little lady, superbly dressed, came into the anteroom and became immediately the centre of attraction, she had priceless lace flounces on her pearl-gray satin gown, oriental pearls and diamonds hanging from her ears and around her little throat, and a beautiful crown of diamond-stars rested on the mass of superb black hair. She was not all elegant-looking, however, although pretty—had fine eyes—but there was a certain indescribable ordinary air about her, a want of real self-possession which makes up what is called "style," after nature and the milliner and the hair-dresser have done their best. She seemed to be conscious of her deficiency, for she varied to make up for it by a fluttering, fussy assumption of mock dignity.

After the Hat ceremony was over, we found out that this little lady's title was the Duchess de Gallese, and that she was to receive the guests. We were presented in due form, and received with the most superfluous politeness. Some of our American sisters, real ladies, did not or would not admit this imperfect manner of the pretty little Duchess, so they gave her their best bows and low-down courtesies. But they had their labor for their pains—never a bit of attention did she pay to them or their pretty reverences; indeed, she seemed to grow more and more ill at ease, and quite unequal to the occasion.

We were then presented to His Eminence, who received us with pleasant, natural dignity. Cardinal Moreau is about sixty, tall, rather heavy in build, has snow-white hair, which goes well with his ruddy complexion; the eyes are dark-grey and soft, and the expression of his face is honest and good—not high-bred or intellectual, but certainly indicative of good sense and solidity of character. There was a pleasing, homely air of hospitality about him, when he turned from our courtesies to the servants who followed him with refreshing waiters on which were every sort of delicious refreshment the Parisian confectioner can invent. His Eminence pressed them on us, and moved on to other guests. The refreshments were indeed delicious, and were served constantly in the greatest profusion.

But where were the Roman Princesses whom I had expected to see? Only two of the Livre d'Or families were present, and while their toilettes were elegant, they were extremely simple. Such occasions they are expected to come out in full force and display marvelous splendor of hereditary lace and jewels. The Princess Massimo and her daughter, Princess Faustina—members of that grand old Roman family who have been in ages past allied to the royal houses of Savoy and Savoy, and of whom St. Philip de Neri said to have predicted that "the Massimo house will finish only with the world"—these two grand ladies were present, and two other minor grandees. That was all! These also seemed to huddle together, as if a little out of place. The affair was very dull and tedious, so my friend and I slipped quietly off and drove off home, where, over a comfortable supper, we discussed the curious social mo-mo phenomenon seemed to surround the supercilious little Duchess.

The next day the mystery was solved. The Princesses were dissatisfied with the choice of the Duchess de Gallese for lady of the house, and had quietly staid away.

"But why?" I asked my informant. "Is she not one of them?"

"No."

"Who is she?"

"The daughter of a rich mason and builder; and, moreover, the very title she and her husband bear is not his by birth."

Then my friend told me the following: The Duke de Gallese was a common soldier—a Frenchman, Hardouin by name. The old Duchess de Gallese and her husband, the greening horses in the court-yard below her palace. She fell in love with him, married him, and when she died left the young man her fortune and title. These substitutions, or jeux commissum, as it is called in Roman law, are not uncommon. It is the thing that many of many celebrated but extinct families have been perpetuated.*

But no noble Roman lady would marry the young pseudo Duke, so he selected a pretty Roman bourgeoise, Nathalie Lozzani, the daughter of a prosperous house-builder. This was the supercilious little lady who received us with such pertness, and my friend's information cleared up the whole affair. The little Duchess has attempted to take a step up the social ladder, and been crowded off—that is all. But let her have patience. In the next generation her descendants may revenge her by hustling off some new aspiring Duchess de Gallese.

Bishop Dupanloup's letter to the clergy of his diocese is the great subject of talk; everywhere you hear it commented upon; it is a perfect bombshell cast into the camp—not by an outsider either, but from one who has always been a staunch adherent of the Papal cause. Like the Duchess de Gallese, its meaning will be for awhile a mystery.

LETTER FROM PARIS.

[Correspondence of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.]

PARIS, Tuesday, Nov. 30, 1869.—Yesterday the re-opening of the prorogued session of the French Chambers took place with what it is customary to call "the usual ceremonies." The weather, which has been rainy of late, cleared up for the occasion; and as Paris has been deprived of its outdoor life during the past few weeks with its habitual festivals and visitors, a vast crowd of well-dressed persons assembled outside. In the splendid Place Napoleon III., and the Carrousel, to witness the arrival of Senators, deputies, ambassadors, princes and princesses, at the principal entrance to the grand Salle des Etats in the Pavillon Denon, and to await the procession of the Imperial cortège to the same spot, as it issued from the Tuileries. The demand for tickets to witness the ceremony in the interior, and to hear the speech was unprecedented; and as the accommodation, for the general public, exclusive of official personages, is extremely limited, the disappointed far exceeded in number those who were fortunate enough to obtain admission. But, in point of fact, "imperial ceremonies" are very cut-and-dried affairs, and are so largely and essentially made up of "gold lace and trimmings," and velvet draperies and gold fringe" to match, that after being seen once or twice, the repetition becomes "weary, stale, flat and unprofitable," and barely repays the two or three hours' wearisome waiting which the "gratification" necessarily entails. I saw nothing inside the hall to distinguish the present from former occasions, except that the Empress, qui brillait de son absence, was not there, and was represented only by her chair, which stood unoccupied, in her usual tribune, between two lower seats filled by the Princess Clotilde and the Princess Mathilde. The Emperor is most tenacious regarding these points and punctilios of etiquette, and would on no account have had it omitted, that Her Majesty, though absent to the eye, should be present to the mind of her devoted subjects; and so the vacant chair was there in due form to mark the graceful presence of the partner of the imperial throne. Why the Empress was absent on the occasion I cannot pretend to say, seeing that had it so pleased her, she might have been in Paris on the 28th of November, instead of Trieste, where, I think, she spent that day. But it is whispered, loud enough to be heard, that it was thought better she should not return "just in time" for the re-opening of the Chambers, lest it should afford occasion (not without reason) for the "editions" to say that, "after all," the prorogation "had" been maintained to "suit her Majesty's convenience." There was another absence noted in the goodly show which, on such occasions, helps to make up the scenes which timed splendors of the Second Empire, and that was the absence of the Cardinal-Senators, who, with their other colleagues of the episcopal order, have carried off their scarlet robes and red caps to adorn a more appropriate assembly at the Vatican.

Well, I shall say no more of the throned tale of brilliant uniforms and tasteful ladies' toilettes, which gave color and brightness, at least, if they could not impart much aid to the Salle des Etats, with its now faded tapestry paintings, plaster busts and statues, and other provisional fittings-up. There is a new hall preparing, and which will probably be ready next year. Let us hope that it will afford larger accommodation to the general public, and thus impart to the opening of what is supposed to be a "national" assembly something more of a "popular," and less of a merely "official" aspect than these ceremonies at present exhibit.

And now for the Imperial speech itself. It is "liberal," in tone; nobody disputes that. The Emperor "says" that it is "time to speak out" and say plainly "what the country wants;" and then he does speak out, and says that "France requires liberty" which is, certainly, as good an allowing that she has not it, as she does. As to "order," he said sagacitatly: "I will take care of that" and then he asks for "faith" to take care of "liberty." He trust his Majesty's request for assistance in the matter will be duly attended to by the Chamber, for (oh! most lame and impotent conclusion to liberal professions) his own unassisted efforts in this direction are of a most disappointing character. The measures, at least the "political" measures (and these are the only ones that have relation to "liberty") announced by the Emperor, and to afford time for the due consideration of which it was thought necessary to prorogue the Chamber from July almost to December, and to maintain that prorogation in spite of all the remonstrances of public opinion against it, are simply the following: The Emperor consents to choose (himself, that is) the forty thousand mayors of France out of the municipal councils—a choice which had been very nearly imposed on him already by the force of public opinion. Next, he consents to restore to municipality to the city of Lyons, instead of nominating it himself, and that the municipal council of Paris shall be chosen henceforth by the Corps Legislatif—a very Parliamentarian jumble of legislation and municipal rights, which I venture to predict will never work well in practice. And this is all, positively all, in a political sense, which, for the present at least, is to be taken as the fulfillment of the Emperor's promises in July and of the liberal "words" with which he opens his decree. For although he does add that there shall be "continual counsels," and that the Conseils Generaux shall be invested with "some" new privileges, he does not specify what they are to be; his promises literally go no farther than the above, as regards any real extension of political liberties. The speech makes no allusion to, or excuse or apology for, the long prorogation. There is not a word of promise about securing the future freedom of the elections by abolishing from presenting official candidates, nor, above all, by presenting a new electoral law, fitting representatives of the electoral districts, and securing them against the arbitrary manipulation and interference of the Minister of the Interior, as practiced in the last elections. Nor is there any promise of securing personal freedom by abolishing the seventy-fifth article of the old Napoleonic Constitution of the Year VIII., (upon which the present Constitution is based), and according to which article every public functionary, from a minister down to a sergent de ville, is made wholly and totally "irresponsible" for every act committed in his official capacity. All these are the crying grievances of the day and hour, and yet the speech does not even allude to them. It is too early yet to know what effect the Emperor's language will produce upon the country, or how it will be received; but I cannot but think that disappointment and displeasure will be the predominant feelings. I send you at present the first impressions of the moment; but a day or two will enable one to judge more accurately of the effects produced.

[From the Monthly Religious Magazine for December.]

A WAIF.—The following song, exceedingly sweet and plaintive, comes to us from a mystic source. It seems not to have been written by any one in the fresh, but dropped down itself from somewhere. Has anyone ever seen or heard anything like it, we wonder? It has all the tenderness of Burns, but we never saw it in print:

When Mary Was a Lassie.

The maple trees are tinged with red,
The birch with golden mellow;
And high above the orchard wall
Hang apples, rich and yellow.
And thus the way, through yonder lane
That looks so still and grassy,—
The way I took one Sunday eve,
When Mary was a lassie.

You'd hardly think that patient face,
That looks so thin and faded,
Was once the very sweetest one
That ever bloomed in shade!
But when I went through yonder lane,
That looks so still and grassy,
Those eyes were bright, those cheeks were fair,
When Mary was a lassie.

But many a tender sorrow,
And many a patient care,
Have made those furrows on the face
That used to so fair.
For time to yonder churchyard,
Through the lane, so still and grassy,
We've borne and laid away our dead,
Since Mary was a lassie.

And so you see I've grown to love
The wrinkles more than roses;
Earth's winter flowers are sweeter far
Than all spring's dewy posies.
They'll carry us through yonder lane
That looks so still and grassy,
Adown the lane I used to take
When Mary was a lassie.

TELEGRAPHIC SUMMARY.

RETURNS from 87 counties in Texas give Davis 5,014 majority.

THE Internal Revenue receipts were three-quarters of a million dollars yesterday.

THE Ecumenical Council meets to-day, simply for the purpose of completing its organization.

MR. BURLINGAME's treaty between England and China has been ratified by the Chinese Government.

REAL's sentence of death, for the murder of Officer Sandelck, has been commuted to one out of three of the New York Supreme Court Judges.

SPEAKER BLAINE, Vice President Colfax, and about thirty Senators, had an interview with the Secretary of the Treasury yesterday.

THE trial of the directors of the banking concern of Jay Cooke and Company, for conspiracy to defraud the shareholders, commenced in London yesterday.

THE Austrian Reichrath was opened in Vienna yesterday, by the Emperor, who announced that important concessions would be made to the different nationalities.

BOSTON held its municipal election yesterday, and Samuel C. Dunn, was elected Mayor by 6,500 majority. The City Council is largely Republican.

IN THE Supreme Court of the United States, yesterday, Chief Justice Chase delivered an opinion sustaining the constitutionality of the act of Congress laying a tax of ten per cent. upon the circulation of State banks. Justices Nelson and Grier dissented.

MATTERS wear a threatening aspect in Portugal. Extensive military movements have been commenced by the Government of Saldanha, between whom and the King the breach is daily widening, and the resignation of the Ministry is momentarily expected.

A SAN RAMEL Dennison, resisting arrest in Elmira, N. Y., on Monday night, was shot by the officer. Wounded as he was, the statistics-house attempted to get up and get left him utterly uncured for until morning, when he was found dead.

NICHOLAS DONOVAN, California, on the night of December 9th, Frank Medina, keeper of a grocery store, and four other men, were murdered by robbers. The place was ransacked, a store was plundered and burned, and the bodies of two men, who escaped it, were subsequently found in the river adjacent.

An official statement has been prepared, showing the disbursements made from the appropriation of $2,000,000, placed at the disposal of the Indian Commissioners by Congress, to enable him to maintain peace among the various tribes and bands of Indians. It shows that the total amount expended, including $1,000,000 now remaining on hand, about $1,663,626. Of this, $1,500,000 will be used to pay for subsistence furnished and to be furnished by the Commissary Department for feeding the Sioux, Yanktons, Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Arapahoes and others, and $10,000 will be needed for the service in Wyoming, and about the same amount in Montana and New Mexico. The residue, say $115,000, will be required for the services at the different agencies in Dakotah.

XLIst CONGRESS—SECOND SESSION

In the United States Senate, yesterday, after the close of our report,

Mr. Cragin introduced a bill to fund the public debt, which provides for $1,000 bonds to the amount of $1,000,000,000, to run for thirty-five years, each bond to bear interest for the first three years, 5 per cent. for the six years following, 4½ for the next six years, and 4 per cent. for the following twenty years. Mr. Wilson introduced a bill to regulate the importation of Chinese under labor contracts. Mr. Carpenter introduced a bill for the reorganization of the Supreme Court, when incapacitated from any cause, at full salaries for life. He also offered a resolution declaring that the Spanish gunboats should not be allowed to sail from the United States, and that the Cuban flotilla by his report, is saying that he would call it up on Wednesday. Mr. Trumbull, from the Judiciary Committee, reported the bill to relieve Congressmen from the importunity of office-seekers. The bill to define the jurisdiction of Courts of Bankruptcy, was taken up, advocated by Mr. Drake, and referred to the Judiciary Committee. The bill restricting the appointment of Assistant Assessors, was considered and laid over. An Executive session followed.

The House of Representatives adopted a resolution concurring with the President's views in relation to the Spanish difficulty, and requesting its renewal at present. Mr. Butler (Mass.) offered a resolution instructing the Ways and Means Committee to report a bill for the deduction of income tax from the interest on bonds, mortgages, and other debts, due from railroad and other bonds. The previous question was moved upon the resolution and the house adjourned. Mr. Davis offered a resolution looking to the opening of our ports to vessels of whatever nationality, and to foreign shipbuilders, and it was laid over. Mr. Butler (Mass.) presented three bills, each for a Commissioner in Virginia, and they were referred to the Reconstruction Committee. Mr. Cox offered a resolution calling for information in Cuban documents, quoting the words of the President's message, and inquiring whether, if such there be, it were over. A resolution offered by Mr. Fox and modified by Mr. Schenck, directing the Secretary of the Navy to cause a vessel to investigate the recent gold fury in New York, was adopted. The resolution of the Tammany Yorkers, asking the recognition of Cuba, was referred to the Foreign Committee. Mr. Cox offered a resolution requesting the President to object, if no objection being made it was not received. Mr. Kelley offered a resolution, which was adopted, declaring the United States not bound by treaties made by foreign powers among themselves, contracting the passage of war or merchant vessels through seas or straits connecting seas. Mr. Butler, from the Judiciary Committee, reported a bill repealing the Tenure-of-Office act. A message from the President was read, showing the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment by twenty-one States, two of the ratifications being defective. The Census bill was considered.
