From the New England Farmer

Climate Makes the People.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—In passing through one of our American cities, especially the more southern ones, the traveller will be struck with the great variety of features he meets with in the streets; he will see every hue of complexion, from the ebony to the pallid white, as well as every degree of ugliness in features and form, up to fine symmetry and beauty; on inquiry, he will find that every nation on the globe has its representative among the busy throng, which, rushing through the streets, pass each other unnoticed; also he will find the darkest colored ones are Africans, or descendents of Africans, from the hottest climate in the world, where the white race cannot propagate, and the others from climates corresponding to their complexions. The Africans show the effects the torrid climate they occupy has upon them, by their dark skins and frizzled hair which grows from their heated skulls. They, like the inhabitants of all warm climates, naturally feel that languor and lassitude which produces a dread of labor, and like savages, live on the spontaneous productions of the earth. and what chance throws in their way. The inhabitants of the south of Europe, the warmer parts of North and South America, Syria, and many other portions of the globe, from the same cause, lack that energy which is necessary to excel in agriculture, and if we may credit travellers, they are far behind the people in temperate latitudes in all that pertains to neatness, convenience, improvements in agriculture, and gardening, and, rather than strenuously assert their rights, tamely submit to the dictation and oppression of the most odious tyrants. The tendency of warm climates upon the constitution of man, is to lessen the energy of the physical faculties, and produce a sensitive irascibility, especially among the people of the United States, which is not always kept under that prudent control which would give the greater lustre to the character of the gentleman. The true determinate spirit of liberty never can be extinguished in the minds of the people of the temperate climates who have once enjoyed it. History tells us of the struggle between this and the mother country of a like people, which lasted for years, and subjugation was abandoned in despair.

Now let us view the contending nations of Europe, in a war between people of a like climate, of like knowledge, and a like determination of character and purpose, and who can help shuddering at consequences, that has not been familiar with atrocities. The struggle between such people bodes nothing short of a prolonged disastrous war; "where reason to restrain" is out of the question, and the unbridled passions of such people, let loose upon each other, what have we reason to expect but consequences of the most fearful kind? Here are people, equally yoked, contending; not the white man with the crouching black, modified by climate to become the subple slave, but people by reputation highly civilized and advanced in the improvement in every art relating to peace or war, and unless the spirit of the God of peace shall operate upon the minds of the people of those nations, to induce them to stay the improved diabolical missiles of destruction, the present winter, death and carnage will claim their victims in unprecedented slaughter.

The weather of the southern climes operates upon the natives like an anodyne, and by its debilitating effects unnerves them from undertaking mercantile or warlike expeditions in foreign lands, like the roving, restless, go-ahead people of the North, where the climate has fitted them with an instinct for rambling enterprises, and a curiosity to see "all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them." The climate makes a difference in the people of our country. We hear of the hardy sons of Maine entering the forests of the South and selecting and felling their hettest oaks for naval purposes, then transporting them home to be formed into ships, thence sent back again to the original owners of the forests to transport their rice and cotton to market. Why not build their vessels at home without so much expense? The want of elasticity in the climate produces languor and a want of energy to accomplish such work. The people of southern latitudes can boast of their heroic exploits in war with nations enfeebled by climate like themselves, but how easily, generally, is their renowned valor and fight bragging put to check by a nation from the bracing skies of the North. Thus we see the people of the North more hardy laborers, more powerful warriors, more industrious farmers and mechanics, more enterprising merchants, and certainly, on an equality, if nothing more, as literary characters and statesmen.
