Humorous.

Awkward.

BY J. CHEEVER GOODWIN.

And so she's engaged to be
To one of our class, married
That it very [illegible] I'm afraid
Her [illegible] much longer she tarried
[illegible] degree would be O. M.—Old Maid.
"I know her?" Oh, yes, or I thought so;
But I'm more inclined to believe
I was wrong. I'm the fellow she sought so,
But couldn't deceive.

"You're surprised?" I imagined you would be;
It's a thing I say little about;
'Twas as open a case as a oil could be—
"Did she love me?" There wasn't a doubt,
Why, she just threw herself at my head, Bill!
But I knew she'd no heart and less brains;
And though money will settle a bread bill,
It won't wash off stains.

"You're astonished at this?" My dear fellow,
What the duce did I care for her age?
I like women like apples—when mellow,
But the fact was, I knew every page
Of her history. "Flirted?" You'd think so,
There was Harry McKeown, sixty-three;
It was she that drove him to the drink so.
"Am I sure?" As can be.

She's a scheming coquette, and I know it;
She hasn't the least bit of soul
Or an atom of truth. "Doesn't show it?"
No; her feelings are under control.
Then it's nonsense to say she has beauty;
I pity the fellow she's caught,
It must be a matter of duty
With him, or he's bought.

Who the duce can it be? There's Fred Baker;
You remember him?—scored for the Nine;
But there isn't much fear that he'd take her;
He wants blue blood, and not a gold mine.
"Chicken" Jones? No, he's married. 'Twas funny
How he ran a tie race with Jim Pront
For the "class cradle," wasn't it? Money
He's got, and the gout.

"Tub" Abbott was sweet on her. Sandy McGillum!—he must be the one,
By Jove, it's old "Sandy, the dandy!"
It's not he? I give up, then. I'm done,
Is it one of our class, are you sure,
That the vixen has seized for her prey?
Who's the fellow? let's have it! What, you are?
The dickens you say!

—Scribner for October.

Kentucklans Getting Married in Indiana.

"Stop that boat," was the cry on the Louisville wharf at 10 o'clock Thursday night, but the cry came too late, for the ferry boat had cut loose from her fastenings and was steaming proudly up the river, fully a hundred feet from the Kentucky shore. The cry came from two men who had hotly chased a young man and his sweetheart from a back country in the State to the river and there lost them by being about two minutes too late, for they were safe in the boat sitting side by side each other in a carriage. The horses panted and the lovers sighed and congratulated themselves on their escape from the dark and bloody ground and their cruel parents. When the boat landed at our wharf the horses were given the reins, the whip applied, and off dashed the bridal party, for Charlestown, the county seat. The pursuers were too close to tarry at Jeffersonville. A brisk, rapid drive of an hour and fifteen minutes brought them to Charlestown. County Clerk Ingram was aroused from pleasant dreams and the marriage license obtained. Next Elder Howe was awakened from his slumbers, and, in less time than it takes to tell it Mr. Okana Owens was the true and lawful husband of Miss L. Jessie Parrent. After spending a pleasant hour the newly-married pair left Charlestown, returned through Jeffersonville, slower than they went up, much less disturbed in mind, and happy as a newly elected country squire. How those Kentucky lovers do laugh at locksmiths.

The Story of a Hat.

"Is this Thomas Hardy?" inquired his Honor.

"Send me afloat if it isn't," replied the prisoner.

"Are you a sailor?"

"Dry-dock me, if I hain't!"

"You'll get into the dry-dock fast enough, my boy. The story goes that you went into a store on Jefferson Avenue and wanted to look at a hat. A hat was shown you and you yelled out 'Shoot the hat!' threw it down, jumped on it, and then ran away. Is this true?"

"The larboard side is about right."

"Well, sir, what induced you to act that way?"

"Shipped too much rum aboard, I guess."

"It looks that way. I can't have you running into this harbor every two or three weeks all summer and asking me for clearance papers. I think I'll throw you into the creek."

"All fast, sir," said the prisoner, with a smile.

"Tell him to go ahead slow, Bijah," continued the court, "and mark him for ninety days."

As Sharp as a Razor.

The other evening a man applied at the general delivery window of the post office to know if there was a letter for Jones.

"Jones? Jones? What Jones?" asked the clerk.

"Just nothing but Jones," he answered.

"I must have the first name—John, Henry, James," she said.

"I know your trick!" he exclaimed, looking very cunning. "You want me to ask for Jim Jones and then you'll say that there's nothing for Jim but that there is a letter for Thomas Jones!"

Fair Enough.

Being in a hurry to cross the river yesterday, a citizen called to a boy who was rowing a boat along the levee and inquired:

"Can you set me across the river?"

"I reckon."

"Will you guarantee my safety?"

"I dun no about that," replied the boy as he wheeled the boat around, "but if I can't do that I'll agree to drown you in better style than any other boy in Vicksburg can."

Said a distinguished politician to his son:

"Look at me! I began as alderman, and here I am at the top of the tree; and what is my reward? Why, when I die, my son will be the greatest rascal in the city."

To this the young hopeful replied:

"Yes, dad, when you die—but not till then."

If it hadn't been for the pull-back style of dress a man in Iowa would have married a woman with a wart on one of her knees. He saw it in time.

Farm and Household.

Keeping Apples for Daily Use.

The question is often asked, What is the best way to keep apples for common family use? We have found central shelves, in an apartment set off or devoted to this purpose, the most convenient. The apples are spread on these shelves, only a few inches deep, so that they may be readily examined or picked over, as fast as decay commences on any specimens.

It is very important that the apples be kept as cool as practicable after gathering in autumn and before the freezing weather of winter arrives. For this purpose they are placed on the floor of an out-house facing the north, and allowed to remain there till about the time that freezing weather commences, when they are removed to the shelves of the fruit room in the basement of the house. This room (which is about ten feet wide and thirty feet long) is separated from the rest of the basement by an 8-inch brick wall, and has a cement bottom to keep the air dry enough. Windows for ventilation are hung on hinges so that they may be opened or closed to any desired degree, for the regulation of the temperature by the thermometer. The nearer this temperature is to freezing, the better the fruit will keep. When the weather is warm outside, the windows are closed to exclude the warm air; when colder, they are opened sufficiently to admit cool air and keep down the temperature.

The apples being thinly spread on the shelves, any decaying specimens are readily detected and removed, care being taken not to disturb or tumble over the sound apples which remain. An examination every few weeks during winter and spring will keep the supply clear of rotten apples.

Among the advantages of this mode are the readiness with which the specimens which will not keep are seperated from the others, and only long keepers allowed to remain. When fruit is kept headed up in barrels, which is a common mode, this selection and separation cannot be made, and while they keep better thus excluded from the air so long as all remain sound, the commencement of decay in a few specimens soon spoils all the rest.

A little practice will enable the attendant to remove those specimens which will not keep, even before decay begins; and by going over the shelves several times during winter and spring, none but sound, long keepers are left.

As warm weather approaches, and it becomes more difficult to keep the apartment so cold as may be desirable for the fruit, a portion of the soundest and hardest are selected and placed in shallow boxes and shoved under the lower shelf on the bottom of the cellar. The cold cellar bottom keeps them at a low temperature and the shelf above serves as a cover to prevent air currents. In this way we have fresh specimens of such fruits as the Baldwin and Rhode Island Greening at the middle of June and we sometimes keep fine, hard, fresh Greenings into the month of July.

The three leading requisites for success are—1. Placing the apples in a cool outhouse in autumn till freezing weather; 2. Removal of decaying specimens from the shelves; 3. Keeping the temperature as low as practicable without freezing, by a proper adjustment of the hanging windows.—Country Gentleman.

Shoes to Fit the Feet.

Writers of "fashion" articles for the daily press and others who affect physiological views regarding the unhealthfulness of high heels and short toes, continue to ventilate their opinions and decry the "prevailing" styles of shoes, especially those made for ladies' wear, at every opportunity. If these people, instead of taking a few exceptionally fancy goods made expressly for the show windows or for especial purposes, as examples of the fashion, would visit some of the prominent manufacturers and examine the styles which are being made in great quantities for the first-class retail trade of the large cities, they would be quickly convinced that our American women are as much alive to comfort combined with elegance as any. We do not deny that shoes with high heels and cramped toes are made and find a market but it is only among certain classes and for special purposes. For the ball room and for the stage such styles hold their ground, and will, probably, for a long time to come. But for every-day use, at home and abroad, the styles of shoes made by the first class manufacturers—for shoes made to measure by the custom makers are only such in name—are as near perfection as regards shape and fit as the distorted feet of the present generation will allow. The toes are wide and roomy, and at the same time not clumsy in appearance; the heels are made low and broad, sufficiently so to sustain the weight of the body without undue strain on the muscles of the leg; the soles are made thick and serviceable for out-door wear, and substantial on those intended for indoors. Besides these general peculiarities, the anatomy of the foot has been carefully studied, and the art has been brought to such perfection that each national or sectional peculiarity has been classified, and goods are made exactly adapted to each. Those manufacturers who aim to be foremost have from four to seven different styles for each size, so that, unless the foot is literally deformed, there need be no difficulty in obtaining a perfect fit.

It is largely due to the perseverance of a few New York manufacturers, who have labored steadily for years to educate the better and more sensible classes of the people into wearing a shoe that was comfortable, and at the same time beautiful, that this change has been accomplished. Knowing that any sudden innovation would not find favor, they have, by gradual steps, so shaped the tastes of their customers that the popular styles are now such as the most critical anatomical grumbler would have difficulty in finding ground of complaint against.

These facts are even more apparent in men's shoes, which have now reached even an ultra extension of sole, almost to ugliness; but it is better so than a style which gives a stilted limping gait.

In these remarks we refer to the most fashionable styles of the principal cities of the Union. There are still many people who think their feet look better in box or concave-toed shoes, but the wide French toe—though in reality it should be called American—and the broad, low heel are the favorites among really fashionable people.

To Preserve Corn.

Cut the corn from tender roasting ears, and put in clean, sweet, tight vessels of any kind, half full of clear, cold brine, strong enough to float an egg. Put a light weight on the corn to keep it under the brine, and set it away in a cool place. If the corn is too salt for your taste, parboil it for a few minutes, and then boil it well in fresh water, and, when thoroughly done, season it with cream or sweet milk and butter to your taste. Bake it, if you prefer it, after boiling.
