THE BROTHERS

By JACK LAWTON.

(©, 1916, Western Newspaper Union.)

Dolores, with her dark eyes and cream-olive skin, looked as her mother might have looked when the young American engineer married her and brought her back to his land.

Dolores knew, too, the trickery of her mother's charm and the radiance of the flashing smile over pearly teeth. Dolores' father worshiped the girl as he had worshiped his love before her, and when his life, too, came to an early end he left his daughter beseeching tender care to the guardianship of the man who was his closest friend.

Again the girl's cajoleries won her triumph; there was no favor not actually harmful which the guardian withheld. And at the height of her beauty and triumph a neighborhood party brought Donald and Douglas, the twins, to Dolores' notice—and to their surrender. Donald and Douglas Bruce were valued members of the small town; young lawyers following the lawyer father before them.

That it was Douglas who did the greater part of the firm's work, and Donald who spent the greater part of the firm's money, made no difference. Both were eagerly welcomed, and many pretty, fetching caps set for them. And then they met Dolores.

That very night as Don sat upon the bed the brother shared, the brothers knew what had happened. Both had fallen in love at first meeting, if not at first sight, with the little half-Spanish beauty.

And so neither one discussed her. And when Douglas closed his office door to an afternoon clientage and soberly went the same road Don smiled after him, for Don was sure of himself, where girls were concerned; even a witching wonder of a girl like Dolores. Once she had almost yielded to his impulsive caress—almost, but not quite. He smiled again at recollection of her startled retreat. But her eyes had made him sure.

Confidence broken, they were drifting apart. After a last miserably sleepless night, Douglas made his decision. He would go to Dolores and ask her to marry him.

And Dolores said yes. It was unbelievable, but her soft whisper still lingered in Douglas' ears, [illegible] caress of her hand as she had [illegible] from his fonder ca[illegible] when Douglas came, vagu[illegible] to the room he shared [illegible] his brother cast upon [illegible] ful glance. "Beastly [illegible] ned Donald; I have to b[illegible] engaged to Dolores to wait [illegible] who will see no one but [illegible] ung, would you mind runn[illegible] Dolores, to explain my [illegible] She says it makes the gu[illegible] to have any fellow call [illegible] the 'phone. She expected [illegible] at the latest."

Douglas considered.

"All right," he agre[illegible] tell her."

He was thinking that he would try again to persuade Dolores to absolve him from the promise that for a time his brother must not learn of their engagement.

Dolores would have to "break it" first, she said, to her stern guardian. She was in the moonlit garden as Douglas came; she had told him regretfully at the recent parting that the guardian insisted upon her companionship in the house at nine o'clock. How, he wondered, had she escaped the guardian. He vaulted the wall, as Donald usually did, that he might quickly reach her side.

With a laugh Dolores turned to greet him.

"Don," she cried; "Don, darling!"

In the shadows Douglas felt the little traitor hands stretched out to meet his own, and then the hands touched his shoulders.

"I thought you'd never come, Don, dearest," murmured Dolores; "your brother Douglas was here, and I had a dreadful time shaking him."

Suddenly Douglas put from him the clinging hands.

"Wait," he whispered, and vaulted back over the garden wall. He was white and breathless when he stood before his brother. They were alike, Douglas realized grimly, enough alike to be mistaken for one another among shadows. Well, he had found out the sham of a girl to whom his love had been given. Now Donald must "get his." "Don," he said brusquely, "do me a favor without question—later you'll understand. Hurry over to Dolores; she's there beside the garden wall. As you approach say: 'Are you there, Dolores? This is Douglas. That's all. For a moment I want her to think that you are me."

Something in his brother's determined expression banished the wondering smile from Donald's lips.

"All right," he agreed briskly, and was gone.

Douglas sat with his face in his hands, waiting. This was a hard lesson that he had sent his brother to learn. After an unbearable time Donald returned.

"She called me Douglas, darling," he said slowly, "as you expected she would. She has been playing with us both, Doug."

His hand groped for his brother's and clasped it; the old love enveloped them both.

"Dolores is going to marry her guardian," Donald said; "she told me so."
