DAILY MORNING POST.
TUESDAY MORNING.....JULY 4

From Putnam's Monthly, for June.

SONNETS.
ON THE DEATH OF A FRIEND.

I.

Now fades one cherished hope from out my life—
The hope to meet again those heavenly eyes,
So earnestly with the glory of the skies:
One form their crystal deeps shone out on me
A glad revealing of the bliss above,
A glimpse of what humanity might be—
If men but knew how God it is to love.
I had but given thee a perishing rose,
With a fond heart, 'tis true, as Beauty's debt;
Thou gavest me a smile, a glance that glows
Deep in my soul a shrined treasure yet.
That very look in Heaven I trust to meet,
More pure it could not be, nor more divinely sweet.

II.

Thy picture lies before me, beautiful!
Beyond all beauty that may pass away
A soft, supernal radiance nought can dull;
The wondrous light of everlasting day
Through those transparent features seem to come;
Style like the angels, they who see a God's face,
And turn, all glorious, to welcome home
Some new immortal to his happy place.
My far-off, bright Ideal! my soul's friend.
Pardon, oh thou knowest, now that time is o'er,
How near and dear thou art! love closer yet blend
But only thoughts with thee for evermore;
How each aspiring after highest good
Seem possible through thee, fair flower of womanhood!

III.

I lay them side by side—the perfect face
And the rare poems that such worth belie.
And reading, think the diver of all grace
That sweetest praiser lover ever writ
Should also be the truest; for to dream
Of poet's fancy art thou peerless one!
That clear, victorious eye, with resolute beam
Has looked on pain and death, and looked then down.
When angels bore away the snowy dove,
Ashiel that nestled in your Eden home.
The morning glory of your happy love.
Can grove of Paradise so nearly come.
They f-ith discerned, through all the gloom of the grave,
The soul, sweet face of Christ, yearning to bless and save
