WHAT IS THE RUSSIAN QUARREL WITH TURKEY?

We have seen a variety of articles noticing the rupture between the Sultan and the Czar, but they all failed to indicate exactly the point of dispute. The basis of the quarrel was, in fact, very like the origin of the Crusades. It concerned the Sepulchre of our Lord and the protectorate of the holy places connected with his history in Jerusalem. The Latin and Greek churches, under the wings of France and Russia, entered the arena; and, at one time, the question was rather between the two ecclesiastical branches, than betwixt the Russians and the Turks. But at length the firman of the Sultan regulated the occupation or use of the sacred localities by the Christians of both churches, and the sovereign's decision was assented to by the Emperor and the Czar, with but few reservations. Russia, however, was resolved not to be contented with a drawn battle. Prince Mentschikoff required that the privileges granted to the Greeks of whom his master claims to be Primate—and which are said to be revocable at will—should be guarantied by a synallagmatic treaty, in the same manner that the immunities and franchises are enjoyed by the Latins, under the protectorate of France. This demand was rejected repeatedly by the Divan. The Latins under the church of Rome amount to but a few thousand, while the Greeks comprise fully twelve millions of the Sultan's subjects. The relative ratios of population will be more clearly seen in the following table:

The number of Turks at Constantinople is	400,000
Turks in European Turkey and the islands	2,600,000
Greeks at Constantinople	150,000
Greeks in European Turkey, the island and coast of Asia Minor	4,650,000
Greeks of free Greece	1,200,000
Slavonians, Servians, &c.	1,200,000
Bulgarians	3,000,000
Wallachians (Dacians)	4,000,000
Vlaks (of Pindus)	600,000
Albanians (Christians)	1,600,000
Armenians (Christians) at Constantinople	250,000

There are also at Constantinople about 10,000 other Christians of all nations, and 20,000 Israelites, who, from dislike to Christians always side with the Turks against them. Among the 2,600,000 Turks of the provinces, 800,000 in Bosina are renegade Slavonians, and almost all the turks of Epirus are renegade Albanians.

Accordingly, the Turks contended, with apparent justice, that there was no equality in the demands of Russia and France, especially as the latter power did not pretend, like the Czar, to become an arbitrator between the subjects of the Sultan and the Sultan himself. The Emperor of Russia, as head of the Greek church, wielding the acknowledged spiritual power and temporal protectorate of twelve millions of Greeks, would soon be able to counterbalance the authority of the Porte.

At this juncture France, England, Austria, and Prussia made a concerted movement, through their ambassadors at Constantinople, to conciliate the Emperor and the Sultan. Prince Mentschikoff renewed his ultimatum several times.—The Divan took time to re-consider the whole controversy. But, in the end, the Sultan's original resolve to maintain the independence of Turkey was fully acquiesced in, and on the 22d of May, the Russian envoy embarked for Odessa, thoroughly checkmated. It is understood that France and England accorded entirely in the decision of the Divan, while it is not unlikely that the two other powers, or at least Prussia, coincide in the result.

The next question is—What will Russia do? We prefer to let his majesty answer that question himself. In the meanwhile, however, we will present our readers with a statement of the relative forces of Russia and Turkey, so that they may see the Sultan is not likely to fall without a struggle that may compare with the one that preceded the treaty of Adrianople. Recent authorities state the military establishment of the Czar pretty nearly thus:

Cavalry, including the Cossacks,	101,692
Foot, embracing every description of troops,	640,388
Artillerymen, Pioneers, &c.,	58,920
Total,	801,000

These estimates, however, are extremely crude, the method being to sum up the several divisions, corps, and regiments of the army, assigning to each its full complement of men. The fact, we are confidently assured, differs from this result to the extent of about 300,000 men; very few of the established corps being filled up, and many of them existing only in name.

The naval armament of Russia, in the Black Sea, is stated as follows:

Line-of-battle ships,	18
Frigates and smaller vessels,	31
Steam frigates,	6
Smaller steam vessels,	15
	70

Add to these over 200 gun-boats, and an unreported force of sailors and marines, and we have a tolerably fair notion of the power destined, for a half century, to capture Constantinople.—The navy floating in the Baltic and Northern Seas, consisting of 54 sailing craft and 13 steamers, with a due allowance of tenders and gunboats, will only form an element of the calculation in case of a general Continental melee.

To resist this potent preparation, the Porte has an army, finely drilled, well officered, and gallant, of 150,880 regular troops; to say nothing of emergent levies doubling that number.—The present armament embraces:

Cavalry,	17,280
Foot,	106,800
Artillerymen, sappers, miners, &c.,	14,600

The Turkish navy numbers:

Sixteen line-of-battle ships, carrying 1,448 guns

Fourteen frigates, carrying 888 "

Thirty smaller sailing vessels.

Eighteen steamers, with a total of 3,700 horse power.

An array of floating batteries, gun-boats, &c., number unknown.

This naval armament is by no means contemptible or disproportionate to that of Russia. So with existing resources the prospects of the Sultan are far from discouraging, nor is the result of a single-handed contest a fair subject for vaticination.

If, in addition to these Ottoman forces, England and France move their navies from Malta and Salamis, and advance them into the Black Sea through the Dardanelles, we think it likely that the Czar will be forced to retreat with uncommon haste. The result, however, would doubtless be a general war. Russia and Austria would probably be allied against the rest of Europe; and, for a while, even France and England would make common cause against Nicholas and the "Young Nero."

Combatants get very hungry, and as men cannot till their fields and fight at the same time, we think it likely that American provisions would be in demand.—Baltimore American.

THE RAPPINGS.

A young woman named Marietta Hammond was sent up to the Lunatic Asylum, to-day, as another victim to that miserable delusion, the Spiritual Rappings. She is 23 years of age.—New York Letter in Saturday's Pennsylvanian.

From various parts of the country we still hear of new victims to that terrible delusion, the "Spiritual Rappings." The latest case that has come to our knowledge is the one recorded above.

Among all the various schemes that have ever been practised upon human credulity and insulted the majesty of human nature, this seems to be the most discreditable to the human understanding, the most humiliating to our race.—Former gross delusions which prevailed among mankind was less disgraceful, because there existed circumstances which at least apologized for their prevalence. They were either maintained by civil and spiritual power, or they involved the interests and pleasures of the people, or they prevailed in an age of darkness, among an unenlightened community, and thus appealed with augmented power to the fears of a benighted and superstitious race. But the present deception has not even these palliating excuses.—It has extensively prevailed in an age that boasts of its general development of intellect—among an enlightened people who possesses all the requisite means of mental and moral culture.—Nor has it been confined to the most ignorant and uneducated classes, who are often naturally most superstitious and liable to the operations of supposed spiritual agencies; but men of intelligence and education, and even ministers of the Gospel, have professed to believe its supernatural character. And what renders this matter still more inexplicable, men adhere to it after the obvious and acknowledged deceptions, frauds and impositions in monetary and other interests, which have been practised through its instrumentality. Nor have the efforts that have been made to explain said effects, the discovery of artificial contrivances to produce them, and the exposure of the various means of deception, succeeded in eradicating this wide-spread evil.—One fact in this connection is peculiarly ominous and characteristic, and that is, the infidel tendency of this "deceivableness of unrighteousness." We have heard of "spirits" that announced the startling information that certain of the cardinal doctrines of the Christian faith are untrue.

Viewing this whole delusion simply in its relations to the human understanding, we seem to be at a loss for a suitable explanation. Its kindred delusion, that of Mormonism, presents a similar moral and intellectual phenomenon. In reference to both forms of imposition, what are we to think of the boasted powers of the human mind? Men of sense, even men of education, have united with the Mormons. 'Tis a caricature of human nature! In the systems of heathen mythology and philosophy, notwithstanding the gross forms in which they were sometimes invested, and the palpable errors they included, there was found a deep meaning, a concealed truth, something for the mind to contemplate, and often an import of profound moment. But here we have nothing but palpable absurdity, gross inconsistency and shameless outrage of human reason. Not a single redeeming feature characterizes this unheard-of deception. It is a foul blot on intelligent beings, and a disgrace to the age in which we live. Posterity will look upon it with astonishment, and regard the 'spirit' as we now look upon the contracted mind that suggested the burning of the 'witches' of New England.

The point, however, which we designed to render prominent, is the relation of this whole affair to the present degree of intellectual development. How are we to account for its progress and extensive spread, when we consider the present advanced state of education among us, and the high mental culture of which we so much boast? To what extent may a highly developed intellect be deceived and deluded?—What causes exist in our physical, moral or intellectual nature, that dispose us to become the dupes of strange fancies and outrageous delusions? These are questions which we leave for theologians and metaphysicians to answer. We would only ask, in how far is the human mind to be trusted? What real advances have we made in the developement of mind, since the days in which antiquity worshipped at the shrine of Apollo, and regarded his utterances as the infallible decrees of Heaven? Do we look upon that age with a consciousness of our superiority? Ah! there was more sense, more reason in the oracles which the Pythoness revealed from her Tripod, than in the abominations of this arch delusion. There were great and solemn sacrifices, devout prayers, and among many a sincere belief in the existence and power of the supposed deity, connected with the worship of the Delphian god—much, therefore, that had a show of reason and seemed based upon the deepest necessities of our nature. But neither in the frauds of the "spiritual rappers," nor in the glaring impudence of Mormonism, is there one extenuating or redeeming feature. Even the very modus operandi of the former is absurd, puerile and contemptible; and the whole mean thing is a denial of human reason, an insult to the dignity of our nature, and a spot of indelible reproach to the age in which we live.

When it is considered how many have suffered by this infernal device—either had their earthly peace and happiness entirely destroyed or their temporal influence and prospects ruined, or even lost their senses through its influence, and became the inmates of a lunatic asylum—it would almost seem necessary to enact and enforce the most stringent laws against all who practiced and abetted this foul delusion. We do not agree with the principle, "if men will be deceived, let them be deceived;" but we go for invoking the strong arm of the law against all who inflict serious injury upon their fellow-men. We go for protecting the interests and promoting the happiness of all classes of men.—Phil'a Register.
