PITTSBURGH: WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 10.

FROM WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, April 7, 1861.

The developments and events of the present week will be watched with the deepest interest and anxiety in all circles here. We are fast approaching the crisis which recent indications have foreshadowed. While the Administration has been charged with inertness and the absence of vigorous policy, it has been prudently preparing measures to meet the exigency, and to fortify itself with the necessary resources. When Mr. Lincoln came into office he found an empty treasury, a demoralized army, and treasonable defection throughout the civil service. He has had to feel his way into public confidence against a factious opposition, and to ascertain the extent of resources at his command, before proceeding to carry out the principles announced in his inaugural, which have never been abandoned for an instant. The time has come when they are to be vindicated peaceably, if the revolted States will permit it, but otherwise if they insist upon provoking a collision, and forcing the Government to an attitude of defense.

Lieut. Talbot reached here yesterday morning with dispatches from Major Anderson, and had full interviews with the President, Secretary of War, and Gen. Scott. There is no doubt but the condition of the garrison requires relief in many respects. Various necessities are nearly or quite exhausted, and must be supplied. While no official intimation was ever communicated to Major Anderson that his command would be withdrawn from Fort Sumter, it is undoubtedly true that he received such an impression from personal conferences which were supposed to reflect the purposes here. They were predicated upon the belief, however, that the withdrawal was a military necessity, which could not be avoided. Recent information has changed that belief, and other facts have induced a course of policy consistent with this idea. In a word, Major Anderson is not to be withdrawn, and he is to be provisioned, as was prefigured in my last dispatch.

Lieut. Talbot will reach Charleston to-morrow afternoon, and, of course, maybe back the conclusive decision of the President. It is calm, but firm, and in harmony with his former declarations. The responsibility rests with South Carolina entirely, and the country will see when all the facts are disclosed, that the utmost forbearance and moderation have been practiced. There is no intention to introduce reinforcements voluntarily, or to change the status which now exists. But the President is unwilling to strike the national flag and determined not to permit the garrison at Fort Sumter to be starved out, or abandoned to the alternative of a humiliating surrender. Whatever is done will be done in the broad light of day, and after full and fair notice, so that the consequence will fall on those who may make the chosen act of peace or war.

In reaching this conclusion, it became necessary, of course, to make extensive preparations for carrying the intention into effect, which may serve in part to explain the recent movements in New York and elsewhere, some of which refer to Fort Sumter, and others to Fort Pickens. If the admission of supplies for the former be refused, the Government has no alternative but to introduce them in the best way it can, and at whatever hazard. In undertaking an enterprise of this nature, it could not afford to incur unnecessary risks, or to publish its purpose for the benefit of those who glory in the shame of being regarded as public enemies. Hence the imposing extent, the dispatch, and the caution which have been preserved throughout.

The investment of Fort Pickens by the Confederate troops is nearly perfect. As yet the Government is uninformed whether the force on board the Brooklyn has been landed or not. The orders were duplicated by two vessels so as to render the communication more certain. At the last accounts it was ascertained that Gen. Bragg had succeeded in extending his lines and works in such a manner that the reduction of the fort is only a question of time, unless re-enforcements can be thrown in. It is believed that the land production, by which it is approached, from the sea, is not in possession of the revolutionists. If so, troops may be landed under cover of the ships of war, or at night, without a serious collision, and perhaps without bloodshed at all. That depends, however, upon the fact stated, and is merely a speculative opinion.

The conviction grows stronger in military circles that a collision is nearly inevitable, unless Jefferson Davis sends contrary instructions, which are not expected. While the Southern Commissioners have been asking the Government here to preserve the status which Mr. Lincoln found upon entering office, their Montgomery President has been raising and marching armies, investing forts, and carrying on the preparatory operations for a condition of actual war; and now when it is proposed to put the national fortifications in a condition of defense, merely to prevent surprise or surrender, they condemn the Administration without stint. The South has been deceived with the idea throughout that if Mr. Lincoln attempted to enforce the laws, or defend the public property in that section, he would be morally isolated by the united Democracy of the North. The truth is, as much pressure for decisive action has come from that source, recently, as from the Republican party, among whom there is a large interest in favor of cutting loose from the Cotton States altogether, by peaceable separation.

This work is likely to be overdone, and the lidings from the South will be regarded with the utmost interest and anxiety here. In view of the possibility of collision, and the contingency of a demonstration against the capital, precautionary measures for its defense have been taken, which will be developed immediately.

The statement which has gained currency that the presence of Secession sympathizers in the troops now stationed here, is entirely unfounded, so far as is known at the proper department, after careful inquiry. Official and competent officers tell me that the fidelity of the defenders, and selected with reference to their qualities for this special service.—N. Y. Tribune.

Mr. Bonligny, member of Congress from New Orleans, who so patriotically refused to join or recognize the secession of Louisiana, goes home to-morrow. This is a good indication, for it may be relied upon that he will never give his consent to that which he has so loyally denounced as vile treason, treachery and fraud.—N. Y. Times.

Secretary Cameron informed to-day to several officers of the army who desired to know their destination, notwithstanding the fact that sealed orders had been given them, that the department could dispense with the services of such officers by striking their names from the roll.

Goddard Bailey, the last one implicated in the Indian trust bond defalcation, will be tried to-morrow. As he did not appear before the congressional committee, the indictment against him will not be invalidated, as it was in the case of Secretary Floyd, and there is every probability for a conviction.—N. Y. World.

Capt. Rynders is at length relieved from the odious duty of serving under this Administration, and Alexander Hamilton Schultz is appointed to succeed him.

In a recent letter from Baltimore we find the following cheering news:—"For the last two weeks business has been brisker than it is in Ohio, ranging with the brightest wholesale grocery firm in this city informed me a day or two ago that they did nothing in February and the first part of March but that in the last twenty days they have sold more than they did during the whole time in 1860. This firm are now convinced that we have Federal Government, and they are not afraid to launch forth.

Fortress Monroe, April 6. Yesterday it is fully believed here that the cavalry and flying artillery which have left New York are bound for Texas, and that General Harney, is to have his hands strengthened by the Government for his contest with the rebels of that State.

It is also believed that the war vessels which have been ordered to sail early, will be used to cut off supplies from the Southern ports.

Washington City, April 8. It is fully believed here that the cavalry and flying artillery which have left New York are bound for Texas, and that General Harney, is to have his hands strengthened by the Government for his contest with the rebels of that State.

It is also believed that the war vessels which have been ordered to sail early, will be used to cut off supplies from the Southern ports.

The Confederacy at a Mathematical Problem, with a Corollary.

The Confederate States are proving that the whole is greater than its parts, thus overturning a postulate of ages. Hard to do; but it is done. For instance, South Carolina wants to borrow $600,000, and cannot. The work on her State House is suspended. Both money and credit are gone. Florida wants any conceivable sum of money for every purpose known to a State's existence. She cannot get a dollar. Indeed, if there be a State, in Christendom to which the vulgar paraphrase of bankruptcy, "flat broke," can be truly applied, it is Florida.

Mississippi is "one more unfortunate." This State is moneyless, and has been for twenty-five years without credit. Her late Legislature held a dreary session at Jackson, nourished chiefly by cold victuals and cold water, and left for their homes without their pay, because there was not a dollar in the State Treasury.

Louisiana, too, is straitened for cash. Her money-pouch, like the pouch of her pelican bird, is oftener empty than full.

Of Texas, we need only say, it is a State constitutionally insolvent in its dearest. Texas began the world poor—grew dreadfully seedy—got bilious by annexation to the Union—and now is penniless and out of the Union again!

This is a catalogue in part of King Cotton's Confederate States. They form a seedy, bankrupt list. In view of their warlike tone, they might be called the "ragged regiment." Take them singly, and not one could borrow a million dollars, much less any money market in the world. But roll them up together, and call them the "Confederate States of America," and put an avowed repudiator at the head of them, and immediately they are expected to be hailed as a rich, strong, valiant responsible and trusted elements of a great nation! Five bankrupt States make one solvent Republic. The whole is greater than its parts. Q. E. D.

This is all true, for do we not read it in the Southern papers: How that Memminger's loan was taken before asked for, (why did he go to the superfluous expense of advertising it?) How that New York and Philadelphia capitalists, who are supposed to reflect the purposes here, in January snubbed South Carolina's financial agents, asked wistfully but failed to get any of the Confederate loan. How that even one of the Rothschilds, scenting the rich pickings after off, hurried to New Orleans, hoping to snap up the entire loan, (see New Orleans papers,) but was firmly refused!

Marvels of marvels—that a half dozen bankrupt States, all poor, several dishonored, and not one that is not trying to borrow money for its own purposes, will make when linked together, in a sort of new-fangled confederation a perpetually solvent and responsible debtor, that all the people will hasten to lend money to.
