PITTSBURGH: WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAY 1.

LETTERS FROM WASHINGTON.

[Correspondence of the Pittsburgh Gazette.]

WASHINGTON, FRIDAY, April 26.

They have come at last. For three long weary days and nights have we watched and waited, some I fear, with fond hearts and evil forebodings, their arrival. They have been on their way hither a long time. On Monday last they were gallantly marching through Baltimore—over the bodies of the traitors, who had dared to obstruct their passage; and later in the day they were cutting their way through hordes of the Maryland militia from the rural districts who had concentrated at different points. On the evening of this same very gloomy Monday, we were told that they had been cut to pieces—that the revengeful soil of Maryland was fast drinking up the blood of their lifeless, mangled bodies, which strewed the entire route from Baltimore. Tuesday morning came, and then it was we heard, with glad and bound hearts, that they were encamped at Bladensburg, having come by way of Annapolis. Famous coming is from the country had seen them, and gave glowing descriptions of their fine appearance. A member of one of the Massachusetts companies, stationed at the Capitol, had climbed to the top of the frame work erected on the dome for the reception of Crawford's statue of "Liberty," and with the assistance of a spyglass, been enabled to see their glistening bayonets, as the regiment broke up their camp and moved towards the city. Again were we doomed to disappointment. Wednesday came, ushering in a morning of resplendent beauty, after another night of painful anxiety. Now they had certainly arrived, and "were all sound asleep in the Capitol." The "hotels were preparing breakfast for them."

Alas! the fatal "after" makes its appearance at eight o'clock, and this joyous excitement, and again we are told that the heroes have met a cruel fate—that "not one has been left to tell the tale." Now, for the first time, some of the "iron-hearted" in our midst begin to have misgivings. The little band of strangers left here, who have pledged themselves to stand firm and not leave the city until the arrival of the military, now grasp one another's hands in anxious silence. Cassius M. Clay and General Lane hastily their companies that they will have special business on hand that night. Towards evening, however, a courier arrives, escorted by a couple of United States dragoons, who orders the proprietor of the Willard to prepare supper for five hundred, and his instructions are given to the Willards. They are to arrive in two hours—just two short hours. The news spreads like wildfire, and in less time than it takes to tell it, both hotels are besieged by an eager throng. One, two, three, four hours—still they do not come. Another night of feverish anxiety. "Five thousand troops at Harper's Ferry, ready to march upon the city, through Georgetown!" "Two thousand of the enemy encamped in a ravine back of Alexandria." Thereby half of northern people who have been driven terror-stricken, from Virginia, leaving their property behind them. A sickening rumor prevalent that a northern man had just been hung, only a few miles out of Alexandria, simply because he would neither swear allegiance to the Southern Confederacy or leave the state. All night long is heard the heavy tramp of the guards, and the clattering of horses' feet. The picket and patrol guards have been doubled. Morning breaks—Thursday, April 25—a memorable day. The long expected succor is at hand. They are coming now—the glorious Seventh Regiment.

The Massachusetts regiment were the first to give the signal of the approach of the train. They up a shout from their cheerers at the Capitol, that might have been heard a mile off. The Capitol, as many of your readers are aware, overlooks not only the depot, but nearly two miles of the road, and they had been on a lookout night and day, for fresh arrivals of troops. As the Seventh debarked from the train, a scene of wild excitement ensued, surpassing anything of the kind I have ever witnessed here.

The Seventh and eight hundred Massachusetts troops left Annapolis at 8 a. m., Wednesday, throwing out skirmishers on either side, and taking with them their sick and baggage in a train of cars. The track was torn up in innumerable places all the way from Annapolis to the Junction, and had to be relaid in very great length. They arrived at the Annapolis Junction at daybreak, after a most fatiguing march. The regiment numbers, including its engineer corps and howitzer company, one thousand men, having received accessories to their number in that extent since leaving New York. They left at Annapolis, preparing to follow on notice, the New York Fifth, Twelfth, Sixty-ninth and Seventy first Regiments, and the Rhode Island troops under Gov. Sprague. Large bodies of Northern troops were on their way to Annapolis, via Perryville. No attack was made on the Seventh from any quarter during the march, but numbers of men on horseback and on foot were seen watching their progress through.

Shortly before 1 o'clock the Regiment emerged from the railroad depot and marched up the avenue, presenting its usual superb appearance, notwithstanding the fatigue and exposure consequent upon their toilsome march from Annapolis to the Junction, and the tedious work of railroad building connected with their march. As they proceeded up the avenue, heralded by the magnificent regiment band, the scene was the most brilliant and exciting imaginable. House tops, windows, balconies and sidewalks were black with people, shouting as if mad, while handkerchiefs were waved, bells rung, and every indication of joy manifested that the brave soldiers who, by lying reports had been cut to pieces, or repulsed and scattered in their transit through Maryland, were here propria persona, and not a man hurt.

The Secretary of State, on learning of the arrival of the Regiment, hastened down in his carriage to meet them as they came up from the depot. The Regiment passed up the avenue to the Executive Mansion, where the President, accompanied by the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War, came out upon the portico and reviewed them. The men looked and marched admirably, and were greeted everywhere with enthusiastic cheers, showing that the loyal spirit of the capital is now aroused to a point that rivals that of the Empire State. The regiment was then marched off to quarters, being distributed in various parts of the town.

The members of the Seventh Regiment, like the Massachusetts Sixth Regiment, will that fought its way through Baltimore, are, almost without exception, young men full of life and vigor, and most of them are men of property. The men are dressed in the gray uniform, with trimmings of black, the gray cap and the long blue army overcoat. Each man carries a haversack, upon the top of which is rolled a heavy blanket, and in which was conveyed under clothing, an extra pair of boots or shoes, a knife, fork, spoon, tin cup, plate, with body belt and cap pouch. All were provided on starting with one day's rations, and twenty rounds of ball cartridges were dealt to each man at the armory or during the inspection, for to be used during its journey, if necessary. The corps of engineers are armed with rifles and sabre bayonets, the troops with pistols and heavy swords, and the eight companies with improved regulation muskets and bayonets. Besides this slender every man is armed with a revolver, carried in a pouch in the front of his belt, and some with heavy dirks and bowies for hand-to-hand fighting. About half a dozen recruits are not in uniform, but are armed. The uniforms have been ordered, and will be sent on to Washington. The musicians and servants are armed with revolvers. The surgeons are provided with cases of medicines and instruments.

At twelve—½ p. m.—the Seventh, having stacked their arms at the Capitol, are filing past my window, on their way to the War Department, greeted with the cheers of men, women and children—the grave and the gay.

The work of expelling from Fairfax county, Va., of many Northern men, is now in full blast, and we must expect all sides those who have left there and are now in this city awaiting the opening of the Northern routes of travel. A gentleman who has erected a splendid grist and saw mill in that county was visited upon Tuesday night by a company of military, and ordered to leave in twelve hours. A citizen of Occoquan, Va., (whose parents and other relatives reside in Georgetown,) was forced to leave that State, because it would be refused to take an oath which would have compelled him to assist in an attack on the Federal Capital. He was willing to swear allegiance to the State and to repel invasion of her soil, but that was not satisfactory.

A number of teams coming to the District from Virginia with produce, were stopped by the State troops on their side of the Little Falls bridge yesterday, and turned back. None were allowed to bring anything to the District, and some of the soldiers said they were going to starve the people of the District out. Some of the citizens of Georgetown had to do without milk in their coffee yesterday morning, as they were supplied with a wagon from Virginia, which was stopped by the Virginia guard. F. A. G.

WASHINGTON, April 27, 1861.

The government now has twelve thousand men here under arms. General Butler's regiment entered town at noon yesterday, from Annapolis, with colors flying, preceded by a fine martial band. Gov. Sprague's Rhode Island regiment followed. The way now seems clear, though it is believed impossible to prevent Secessionists firing along the railroad from tearing up the track.

It is said, however, that Gen. Scott, in view of the obstinate attempts made to frustrate his design of opening a military road, via Annapolis, will, in a day or two, if he has not already done so, order Gen. Patterson to march through Baltimore; and that he has planned a method of co operation, through the forces now concentrated at Annapolis, which will render it the more effective beyond a doubt. Mr. Lincoln is within a day or two become entirely satisfied of what all persons will acquainted with the peculiar character of a certain class of Baltimoreans knew in the first place—that the more respectable, well-thinking, sober-minded portion of that doomed city were opposed to the ignominious demonstration made there a week ago to-day; hence, I presume, the determination that troops shall be allowed to reach the seat of government by the nearest route. And this determination does not, as Baltimoreans will doubtless contend, violate the pledge given by the President to the Baltimore committee. That pledge was distinctly stated—"not more troops shall pass through your city unless their passage by other route is molested."

I have been told within an hour that the Seventh Regiment would not have been molested had they been at liberty to adopt the Baltimore route—that the idea of "abolition soldiers from Massachusetts attempting to pass under their very noses," was what did the mischief. They will very soon learn that, in the loyal States, politics has nothing to do with this issue.

It is generally believed that the Maryland legislature, which meets in extraordinary session today, will adjourn on Monday, after having recommended the speedy assembling of the convention. It is to await the action of this convention that Gov. Letcher has ordered the Virginia troops to repair to their homes and
