PITTSBURGH:

TUESDAY MORNING, JULY 9, 1861.

Making the Blockade Effectual.

The blockade of the seaports of the Rebel States is complete. New Orleans, Mobile, Galveston, Charleston, Savannah, Norfolk and Richmond are as thoroughly cut off from the commerce of the sea as if the sea had no existence. No vessel can get in to them or out from them, and the Marine Lists of the newspapers of those cities contain the melancholy chronicle from day to day, "No arrivals or departures."

The Mississippi, also is effectually blockaded at Cairo. No supplies of any kind can pass to the enemy through what was formerly its chief source of supply.

As a consequence of this close blockade of the main channels of trade to the South, there is much suffering throughout that whole region for want of many of the necessaries of life. They have but little pork or bacon; flour is becoming scarce; the stock of dry goods is well nigh exhausted; the supply of boots and shoes is used up and leather is not to be had; and all the various articles of consumption for a supply of which they have depended on the North are as scarce as bread in a famine.

But the blockade is still not effectual, because two or three important points have been overlooked. The first of these is Louisville, Ky. From this point the South can be supplied through two channels. It is now supplied (partially) by shipments through the Cumberland Gap into East Tennessee, and thence by railroad to Richmond and other southern ports. The Government could easily stop this outlet by supplying the Union men of East Tennessee with arms, and giving to them the task (which they seek) of guarding the Cumberland Gap and taking possession of the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad at Knoxville. By doing this all access to Richmond and the South by the roads which there branch off in all directions, would be cut off completely, and the act would give, besides, to the Union men of Kentucky and Tennessee that share in the conduct of the war which they so much desire.

But, whilst this would destroy the direct communication between Louisville and the Rebel army, an indirect route would still remain open. Shipments could be made from Louisville to Nashville, and from thence South by a chain of roads, to Charleston and other extreme Southern points in connection with Richmond. To stop this, therefore, it will be necessary for the government to take possession of Louisville, and stop all shipments to the South from that point.

The Cumberland Gap, or what is known in Kentucky and Tennessee as "the Kentucky Trace" has been and is a great outlet for cattle and grain. The whole of the region of Kentucky and Tennessee contiguous or tributary to it is rich in agricultural productions, and is occupied almost exclusively by a brave and Union loving people. It is very important, therefore, that these people should be employed in defending the Union and in preventing the valuable products of their farms from falling into the hands of the enemy. This, and the necessity of cutting the enemy off from the valuable railroad connections at Knoxville, render it essential that the government should give its attention to that quarter as well as to Louisville.

One other point it will be necessary to guard, and then the South will be completely at our mercy. The great Virginia valley, extending across the whole State from Winchester to Tennessee, and thence on through Tennessee into North Carolina, is a rich grain and cattle country, and its supplies ought to be cut off from the rebels. The Tennessee end could be controlled by the possession of Knoxville; the Virginia end of it could likewise be controlled by the possession of Staunton and Charlottesville. This, however, is undoubtedly a portion of Gen. Scott's plan, and will be reached in good time; the other points should be attended to at once. Louisville and the Kentucky Trace are now the main dependence of the rebels for supplies and should be taken possession of without delay.

Western Texas.

There is territory enough in Texas to form five States of ordinary size, and by the treaty, or rather the joint resolution, by which it was annexed to the Union, it was provided that so soon as the population should warrant it, it should be divided into two, three or more States. It was of course expected at that time that they would be slave States; and the proposition to divide was decidedly a Southern one, as every State that could be carved out of Texas would have given two Senators devoted to the interests of slavery. Thus, had the South been able to carry through its programme, Texas could have been made to counterbalance any five of the free States in the United States Senate, however populous. In fact, the annexation of Texas, had it succeeded as its authors expected, would have secured the preponderance of slavery in the Senate forever.

But things did not work right. The rich soil and genial climate of Northern and Western Texas attracted large settlements of German immigrants, who will have nothing to do with Slavery; who do their own work, and whose industry leads to thrift far surpassing that of the proud and careless slaveholder. The consequence was, even before the election of Mr. Lincoln, that the Southern politicians durst not propose to divide Texas, lest the Dutch should be too strong for them, and vote Slavery out. The population increased far more rapidly than was ever before known in a Slave State, it having risen from 212,000 in 1850 to 600,950 in 1860.

It is now said that a movement is on foot to form a new State out of Western Texas, loyal to the Union, from which Slavery will probably be excluded. This movement is perfectly legal, because of the provision already existing for the division of that State. Indeed it is the only State in the Union for the division of which provision has been made; and this was done because its territory is about five times as great in area as that of any other State. The movement, moreover, is not only legal, but it is highly expedient; because it will put an insurmountable barrier to the progress of slavery in a south-west direction; and also because it will form an invaluable base of operations for the suppression of treason by enabling the government to outflank it on that side, even to the shores of the Gulf of Mexico.

But although it may be both lawful and expedient to establish a new free State upon our South-western border, yet prior to the consummation of the act of separation, it would be well to organize a Provisional State Government there, the jurisdiction of which should be made to extend over the whole of Texas, thus superceding and abolishing the present traitorous government, just as it has been done in Virginia.

There is something in this strange revolution in our country closely analogous to what we often see in nature. A poisonous vine sometimes attaches itself to a tree, intertwining itself in deadly embrace with all its branches, checking its growth, sucking out its life-blood, and finally killing it—tree and vine thus perishing together. But in the roots there are life and health, and a young and vigorous shoot is thrown up, which in time takes the place of the original tree, free from the baleful parasite that proved fatal to it. So it is likely to be in this case, for we do not believe that there is a single State in the Union so thoroughly poisoned, but that life enough remains in the root to produce a new and healthy organism.

News from Europe.

The Great Eastern brought the most important freight of European news we have received for a long while. The four days' interval from the previous dates had been remarkably filled. Death had again been the most noted actor on the great stage—and he can appear only in fifth acts and final scenes everywhere. The great Italian minister was the last illustrious victim that had fallen—and none greater than he remained.

There remained, however, both Kings and the ministers of Kings. Of the latter, another, not so distinguished as Cavour among the statesmen of Europe, yet well-known both as a political leader, and for several valuable contributions to literature, John Campbell, Lord Chancellor of England, is numbered with the departed. "He died very suddenly, having ruptured a blood vessel"—is the brief announcement of the telegraph.

Death has also stricken one who for years has feebly worn a crown—all that remains of a crown to be worn—where once the seat of empire for all the East was proudly fixed, on the shores of Marmora, by the Golden Horn and the classic Bosporus.

Abdul Medjid, the late Sultan of Turkey, was born May 6th, 1823, and succeeded his father, Mahmoud II, on the throne July 1st, 1839. His character was very different from that which would have been required to uphold the tottering empire which he inherited. Weak, almost to effeminacy, he was himself ruled, not only by his ministers but by more than one of the imperious ambassadors representing foreign States, who dwelt at his Court. During the Russian war he was said to have manifested more energy than he was supposed capable of; but he soon relapsed into the same sensual and imbecile condition from which the impending danger had momentarily roused him.—He attempted many reforms, but lacking the energy to carry them out, the mere firman, or decree, often remained a dead letter—neglected, if not openly defied, by the Pashas who administered the government in the various provinces of the empire. Though Abdul Medjid leaves several legitimate children, none of them will succeed him on the throne, for the law requires that the oldest living male member of the imperial family shall have the right of succession; and, therefore, as the telegraphic dispatch announces, his brother, Aziz Effendi is now the Sultan of Turkey.

—In the English House of Commons we note that the leaders both of the Government and of the Opposition, as well as independent members, are forward to declare what now seems the unanimous feeling of the British public—that "no distrust of faith in the Northern States" shall be indicated by any act whatever; and in reference to the sending of troops, which had been objected to, Lord Palmerston, while he defended the act of the government as a "usual precautionary measure of all governments in the immediate vicinity of hostilities," yet expressly declared that it indicated no distrust of the Northern States and no want of confidence in the Canadians.

We have been permitted to copy the following letter, sent from the Post Office Department to a postmaster, in answer to one written by him, making inquiries in regard to using the frank of a member of Congress to cover the correspondence of private individuals. We deem the subject of sufficient importance to warrant its publication in our columns at this time:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Appointment Office, June 21, 1861.

SIR: Your letter of the 18th instant is received.

The franking privilege conferred upon members of Congress was intended to cover their own correspondence, public or private, and such public documents as may be sent free of postage under the several laws of Congress. It is a personal privilege—travels with the party enjoying it—can be exercised in one place only, at the same time, and cannot be delegated to another. It therefore follows that the franking of letters written by others, and in which the member has no interest, is not within the spirit or the meaning of the law. Any construction of it conflicting with this has not received, and cannot receive, the sanction of the Department.

The genuine frank, endorsed on a letter by the member himself, is prima facie correct and legal. If, however, it appears clearly that the member is not at the time, nor has recently been, in the vicinity of the office of mailing, or if the use of the frank appears to be utterly apart from and covering matter not known to the member, you will assume the use of the frank to be unauthorized by him, as you cannot presume that one of the makers of the laws will consent to their violation. All such letters must be held for postage; and if the writers, after general notice, do not come forward and pay the postage, they must be sent to the dead letter office. It will be proper for you to give notice of your determination to enforce the regulation before returning them.

I am, respectfully, &c.,
JOHN A. KASSON,
First Assistant P. M. General.

Senseless Clamor.

The clamor raised against the Administration by certain papers in New York, says a late letter from Washington, will recoil, unless appearances greatly deceive us here, with unexpected force against themselves. The fiery editors will wake up some fine morning and be compelled to acknowledge that what they have sought to condemn as "poltroonery," was nothing but prudence; and that the "inaction" for which they have condemned the War Department, has had the wisest and most untiring industry behind it. This is the general belief, founded on information which would seem thoroughly reliable, and which there is good reason to implicitly credit. Turn your telescope round the heavens, and keep a sharp look-out for the least speck of war, is advice proper to this occasion. By the time you detect it, and probably before you have ended your dispute as to whether it is a veritable speck in the heavens, or merely a discoloration on the outside lens of your glass—the whole firmament, so we think, will be suddenly overcast with battle-clouds, and nothing heard from beneath the black canopy save the roar of advancing and resisting armies. "Have faith in the President," is the general cry here in military circles; and "wait patiently the plans of Gen. Scott." Rome was not built in a day, nor can the cause of the Union be helped by captious paragraphs. I write this, conscious that my own pen, to some extent, has not been free from the blame of over-zealously advocating the popular view of a high-pressure and electric telegraph war policy. But we must all feel that the great Old Chief who directs the armies of the Union is deserving of every confidence and much non-questioning trust. "He is not to be hurried by the newspapers," say his friends; "but when the time comes for action, you will see that he is not to be retarded by his enemies."

Siamese Ambassadors at Paris.

The arrival at Paris, of a Siamese Embassy, says the correspondent of the New York "Post," has been one of the excitements of the week. These copper-colored, strangely dressed children, for they act more like over-grown boys than men, appear immensely astonished at the size and grandeur of the French metropolis. Many curious stories are told, too, of their habits, stories which one can well believe in looking at them. For example, the principal ambassador—there are three, with a suite of twenty persons—cannot understand why he, being the highest personage in the company, should not occupy a seat on the box of the carriage with the driver. Then they blow their noses with their fingers, but not in the manner of badly brought up Europeans, by pinching their nose between their thumb and finger; they apply their index elegantly to one nostril and blow gracefully out of the other, a system which has the advantage of clearing a convenient circle around the persons of their excellencies.

They do not use the steps of the carriage, but spring up from the ground, regarding this mode as more compatible with their dignity. These ambassadors, whose names beat those of the Japanese ambassadors to Washington all to pieces, have brought valuable presents to the Emperor, to whom they were presented yesterday at the Palace of Fontainebleau. But they did not bring a white elephant, as it was reported they would, for this animal being sacred, it was deemed an unfit present for an unbeliever. An Embassy was sent from Siam to Paris, during the reign of Louis XVI, but this was the first and last one until the arrival of the present one. We are indebted for this one to Gen. d'Orgoni, a Frenchman, who lives in Siam and Burmah, and is in high favor in those countries. They come to make a commercial treaty.

FORTRESS MONROE, July 7.—The U. S. steamer Susquehanna is being towed up the Roads by a gun-boat. One of her shafts is broken.

The U. S. frigate Cumberland will sail for Boston within forty-eight hours.

John A. Kasson, First Assistant Postmaster General, and Charles B. Sedgewick and Theo. M. Pomeroy, members of Congress from New York, are at Old Point to-day.

Young Raymond, son of the Principal of Chesapeake Female College, came to-day as a deserter from the Rebel army. He was impressed into the service some time since. He represents their case as desperate.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE HOME GUARDS, Homewood, July 6, 1861.
THE MAJOR GENERAL OF THE DIVISION of Home Guards of Allegheny County, cannot avoid the intimation of his regret that an accidental circumstance has delayed, even for a few hours, the expression of the high gratification afforded him by the parade of the "Home Guards" on the anniversary of the memorable 4th of July. That gratification does not rest alone upon the number, the equipments, the discipline and military movements of the "Guards"—it is greatly enhanced by the moral, cheerful and happy deportment of the entire force.

What American can be so faint-hearted as to despair of the Union, after witnessing the manifestation of public spirit and loyalty voluntarily displayed by associations of men under no control but that of honor and love of country?

Let us not omit our just tribute of grateful sentiments to the citizens who deserted their houses to manifest on the public squares and avenues, by their happy cheers and demonstrations, the approval of the spirit and conduct of the "Guards" devoted to the protection of their homes.

By order of MAJOR GENERAL WILKINS, Commanding.
JONAS R. M'CLINTOCK, Adjutant General. jy9:1t

HEADQUARTERS THIRD BRIGADE, Home Guards of Allegheny County.
THE BRIGADIER GENERAL COMMANDING takes this occasion to express his high appreciation of the soldierly bearing, the gentlemanly demeanor and the patriotism of the officers and men of his command, upon the parade in honor of the anniversary of our National Independence.

The threatened destruction of the Union, and overthrow of the Government, called upon all true-hearted Patriots to rally for their preservation. While the ranks of the active service were crowded to overflowing by your fellow citizens, many of whom were unable to obtain acceptance, you, coming from your daily avocations, have made soldiers of yourselves—ready for service when the necessity for your service shall come. Your organization, your equipment, the perfection of your drill, are matters of just pride to your fellow-citizens.

The moral effect of your organization will be felt both at home and abroad. Your friends know upon whom they may depend for the safety of their homes and their firesides, and the enemies of the State may see in your prompt and effective organization a fair exhibition of that great patriotism which rules the hearts and guides the hands of the American people. By order
BRIG. GEN. BIRMINGHAM.
JOHN B. GUTHRIE, Assistant Adjutant General.
