State Agricultural Exhibition.

[From our Special Correspondent.] Philadelphia, Sept. 20, 1879, In connection with the Permanent Exhibition, in the main building of the Centennial Exposition, the State agricultural show has been a success At 6 o'clock this evening it was closed the events of the past two weeks.

Without a doubt this has been proven to be the place to hold the exhibition, as in no time in the history terest is on the west of the Elm of the society did they receive such encouragement and patronage as now, nor have they been able to continue graced Agricultural Hall; how butter any previous occasion. The edict of need of those things as yet, they come Brockwayville with the rest of the the Park Commission for the removal of the building was a help, many striving to show their opposition by their presence. We enjoyed this day among the farmers of our State, and to those who might suppose the "Keystone" to be made of coal and petroleum this would be a final and overwhelming argument. We could not exploding (?) we would have invested do justice in this article to the efforts fear he has crippled poor George for of the Society to bring before the genlife. Look out Johnie, or Daniel will erous public the wealth of our products and manufactures. We shall not try but simply give a passing glimpse of what we saw, knowing full well much of interest escaped our attention.

To those who visited the Centennial this brought visions of the grand main building in 1876, when day after day might be spent among the curiosities there displayed. The change is great though all the splendor of those days has not departed. The mammoth organ peals forth to the multitude who the departments of public comfort, gather to witness the merry skaters some of whom glide so gracefully upon the rollers while others are as successful as we were in our first attempts upon the equally safe-iced sidewalk. Here, too, two velocipedes roll along at a fearful speed, it seems to us, and our thoughts bring some of our Ridgway friends to witnesss the exploits of have accompanied us thus far. these professional bicycle riders. At first we wander among venders of "sweet cider" and "fresh pop corn" and wonder where the State show is, in answer to our inquiry we are told "all over" and we start in pursuit. Turning to our right from the Elm Avenue entrance we found the cattle and are satisfied that that there is a State Agricultural Exhibition. It was the end of the bone cutting through choice selections of stock. We would not particularize fearing we might display a pardonable ignorance. We must step aside to notice "The Drama of Washington at Yorktown," This was placed in its position shortly after the Centennial, is situated on the right of the Belmont Avenue entrance. Do not fail to notice it when you come to the Permanent Exhibition. It is a review of the troops on the second day after the surrender of Cornwallis, not those who fought the earlier battles of of the Revolution but the veterans of the Continental army and the regiments of Louis XVI. I give a description partly quoted from the artist. In the foreground is a corporal's guard of sappers and miners, immediately following is the famous regiment, named by King Louis XVI the "Royal Au-Vergne" headed by its famous band, and fife and drum corps, and bearing aloft the colors of France and the United States, typical of the firm alliance; following these are the other six French regiments. General Washington is the central figure of the group of mounted officers, on his right Rochambeau, on his left Lafayette. Passing the transept on our way we come to the horses, who does not love horses? All could be gratified here, it would take half a day to read the pedigree, as we have a desire to avoid 'genealogies" we feasted our eyes on these splendid creatures without noticing their names, etc. Turning to the and everbody seems well pleased over | left along the western end we find agricultural implements and "Jackson's Best," but as we do not indulge we pass rapidly. Nothing of much in-Avenue entrance, while in the centre we see the "Old Windmill," which before the public for so long a time on is made, cheese &c. But we have no when necessary without our giving ourselves any thought and we risk our ignorance until another Agricultural Exhibition. There were many other things good housekeepers would stop to examine. A perfect safety valve for coal oil lamps, if it had been something to prevent lamp chimneys from for the benefit of some persecuted friends. A "self-lasting broiler"-I wish our landlady had one-this one would broil fish, meat, oysters, clams, tomatoes, and just the thing to toast bread.

A machine for extracting the juices from fruits and operated like a coffee mill, another contrivance for cutting meat, just think, more hash, we don't wish for any, thank you. Washing machines, patent coffee pots, new fangled skirt elevators, and more than heart could desire to make the good woman's labor light. As we reached we took a seat to wait for some oysters aud listen to the music. The oysters were good and the music also. In a little while the band gave us "Whoa, Emma" followed by "Grandfather's Clock" then it stopped short, and we bade adieu to the State agricultural show and now to the kind friends who
