RAPID IMPROVEMENT IN TELEPHONE SWITCHBOARDS

When the telephone was first invented and put to practical use it was found that it was necessary to have a person at each end of a wire.

This first telephone and switchboard were located in parlors and bedrooms, the person in whose house the telephone had to stay in order to receive messages from the telephone in the other house, usually from his bedroom or his office.

At that time it was not thought of as a device to have an exchange of messages between many users.

In May, 1877, the first exchange was established, connecting five business houses.

This was followed by the first commercial telephone exchange, which was installed for New Haven, Conn., on Jan. 28, 1878, with 21 subscribers, telephones and soon they were in use in New York, Boston and Philadelphia.

This first commercial switchboard was succeeded by various other boards up until 1879, when the first "Multiple" board was installed.

The largest type of multiple boards have room for 2,000 line subscribers, 15,000 operating lamps and over 100 miles of wire, more than enough to span the continent.
