Low down in the northern borizon was a dense bank of clouds, occasionally emitting electri-cal discharges. The belt of mist, it could not be called a cloud at this time, assumed at first a reddish appearance, probably reflecting the glare of the gas-light in the city. Between this belt and the baak of clouds the sky was beautifully clear, and the stars see med to be unusually brillingt. The belt appeared to be stationary for some time, when at last it com-menced moving in a southerly direction, maintain-ing its sweeping position across the etherisi arch. There was not a breath of air sufficiently strong to tusfice a leaf. Suddenly a cool breeze sprang up from the north, and for five minutes the poople who hap-pued to be in the streets were gratefully refreshed. This puff from the good wholesome north was suc-ceeded by a dead calm. The belt of mist, by the time if had reached the southern sky, seemed to roll itself into a dense black cloud, with rounded outlines. It kart this position unit it faded away in the far dis-tance.
