TREATMENT OF COWS.

These amiable and peaceful animals should be trated at all times with the greatest kind-Dres. Milkers and others having the care management are often chargeable for much of the difficulties they encounter in the prosecution of their respective vocations, to their own indiscretion; in attempting to correct bad habits by violent remedies, which serves only to confine the evil, and not unfrequently becomes the source of others that no assiduity of attention is capable to overcome or modify. Many a valuable animal has been ined by harsh treatment, especially during the first season after dropping their first calf, when they are particularly timid, and should consequently be approached and managed with the most gentle care. It sometimes happens that a degree of intermescence or excoriation of the udder, occasioned either by an undue secretion of milk, or the action of the call's jaws while sucking, produces restiveness, and renders the operation of milking one of great difficulty ; but under such circomstances the kindest treatment should be adopted, and no beating or flagellation, however light, allowed. Great care should also be taken to ascertain, if possible, the cause or origin of the evil. Animals naturally disposed to gentleness, may, under such circumstances be utterly roined in a few weeks. Fastening up the head, twisting the nose, and perhaps no less objectionable and certainly no less cruel practice of compelling the animal to stand on three legs during the operation of milking : - all of which are recommended by some,-should never be practiced until all other resorts of a more gentle and modifying character have failed.

In milking great care should be used not to excite fear or occasion pain. The following article, which we copy from one of our eastern excharges, contains several valuable suggestions, and should be perused and pondered by every one who has the management of cows.

"Having milked more or less every season since I was a "whee-bit boy," says the writer, "and having seen it done so poorly as to injure the cow, I propose to give a few rules for it, which I have learned from my own and others experience.

1. Have you got a stool to sit on. 2. Have your finger nails pared short and mooth.

3. Sit down and clean the bag, and we the teats with the first stream of milking. 4. Then set the pail under, and milking as fast as you can conveniently-the faster the better. A cow will give more milk when milked fast, than when milked slow. 5. Milk as though the teats were full to the last, otherwise it makes them slow to "strip" in a little while. 6. Never scold or strike a cow for running about the yard or kicking. It generally does more hurt than good. 7. If she runs about, have patience-talk kindly to her, and tie her up, as a last resort, till she is not afraid-"S. If she kicks, sit forward far enough for she cannoc come forward of her leg, and

TO PREVENT MILE SOURING DURING THUN-DER STORMS .- We have heard great complaints from dairy women, about their milk getting sour during a thunder storm, although perfectly sweet a short time previous. The following plans, suggested by a correspondent, will prevent this in a great degree. All the pans containing the milk ought to be placed upon non-conductors of electricity, such as blocks of baked wood, pieces of glass, or wood that had been well painted and warnished. The following articles are most easily provided : Beeswax, feathers, and woollen & iinen cloth are also non-conductors, but convenient to be used. All these articles will insulate the pans and prevent the electric fluid from entering, which is the cause of tin pans, the plan would be better still, and there would then be no necessity for the practice suggested above. The glass would preserve the milk much longer than tin pans, he sold for Cash. Paper Hanging done in the and the acid would have no effect upon it-We are not aware of any acid that has the least impression on glass, except the finoric soid. All iron vessels, or vessels compounded of iron, as tin pans, attract the heat very readily, and, of course, sour the milk; and such is the affinity of iron for an acid, that we doubt if it is ever washed out entirely. Iron vessels, we are confident, are the very worst that could be used for the purpose ; they are inferior to wood .- Farmer and Mechanic.
