THIRTY-FIRST CONGRESS-1at Session. WASHINGTON, March 5, 1850.

1.1

Mr. Foote rose to make an explanation, which he premised with a notice that he should, on Thursday, after the speech of Mr. Webster, ask the Senate to proceed to the organization of his proposed meeting of thirteen members, to settle all agitating questions. After passing an culogium upon Mr. Calhoun, he read that portion of that Senator's speech, in which he alluded to some amendment of the constitution restoring to the South its equilibrium as necessary to the settlement of the question. He denied that such an amendment would be indispensable to such settlement. He had desired to settle these agitating questions at once, and not to wait an amendment of the constitution for that lished at $3 per annum, but as an inducement, purpose. He had thought that the strong ground of the South was, that she asks nothing but what the constitution gives her-but here was a proposition not to maintain what tha South has under the constitution as it is, but what she would have if that instrument be amended in a particular way.

Mr. Calhoun here entered the Senate chamber and took his seat.

Mr. Foote proceeded with some remarks in reply to Mr. Calhonn's attack upon the North. As a whole, there were in the North many lovers of the Union, who had ever, and always would stand up in behalf of the constitutional rights of the South. Even now the patriotism of the North was being aroused in behalf of the South ; and, for one, he could not sit in his seat and hear the language of general decrial in which his friend from South Carolina indulged.

Mr. Butler said he had not understood his colleague to state an amendment of the Constitution. It would be a sine quo non of a settlement. He did not understand him to express the opinion, that if the Union was to be perpetuated, some measure ought re be taken, which would give the South not only their rights, but a sense of security in the Union.

Mr. Calhoun arose, much agitated, and objected to Mr. Foote's having called up this matter in his absence. He did not even know what the Senator had charged him with. Had he charged him with disunion, or intimated it ?

Mr. Foote explained that he had carefully avoided any intention to cast such imputation. He repeated his first remarks, and in conclusion denied that Mr. Calhoun was his leader. He stood by and for himself. He, too, represented a sovereign State. It was proper for him so to do, and he would fulfil his duty as such, fearlessly and without favor. He would brow-beat, menace, threaten, insult or brow-beat, menace, insult or hector him .--He and the Senator differed, and his (Foote's) constituents would not sustain the Union ad-

SETTLEMENT OF THE DUEL. The duel between Col. Davis of the Senate and Col. Bissell of the House, that was to have taken place, as is generally known, has been settled; and a part of the correspondent of the Tribunt gives the following as the facts of the case, which are not allogether made plain by the statement of the friends of the parties :-

After Bissell's speech Davis wrole him, letter asking whether he had said anything derogatory to the honor of the Mississippi regiment. Bissell replied, stating what he had said, which was of course a simple reiteration

Mr. Foote replied, expressing his belief that the South could honorably and safely remain in the Union, under a compromise such as he believed could be made in ten days, and without any amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. Calhoun admitted that the difference was one of opinion, and he denied that he had decried the North as a mass.

Mr. Foote, (interposing) read the passage in Mr. Cathoon's speech, in which he says, "every portion of the North entertains views or foelings more or less hostile." He de- done the present season. Mr. Calhoun insisted upon the accuracy of his assertion. He must judge men by their acts, not their professions. It was idle for a man to profess to love the Union, while he failed to observe the Constitutional stipulations. He referred to the irregular manner in which Mr. Foote had brought up this mat. ter as unkind.

Mr. Foote denied any unkind feeling or in tention. He had only desired to take the opportunity to make the explanation before the speech of the Senator had created and fixed a wrong impression on the public mind. ion upon the controverted question.
