WE ARE ALL COWARDS IN THE DARK.

A medical friend of ours who, some years since, visited Paris under circumstances most favorable to an entre to a most interesting circle-that of the survivors and cidevant supporters of the "Empire" -tells a capital story as he heard it related by the celebrated General Excelmans, one of Napoleon' pallitans. It was a dinner party, composed of the survivors of Waterloo, a few of their younger relatives, and the section or an ex-King, on a visit from his home in America, and to whom our friend owed his introduction to the circle, Some questions arose about bravery, when the young members of the company were electrified to hear the venerable and heroic Excelmans gravely and seriously declare that men were all cowards in the dark! The General smiled at their expressions of dissent remarked that it was "very like youth" and proceeded to tell the following anecdote in support of his strange declaration:

"There was a young hot head in the Emperor's service, who burning for action, and his duties for the time affording no opportunity, at last resolved to fight a duel, and chooslenged him. The elder soldier waving all considerations of rank, agreed to meet the young man, but on the following unusual terms. The time should be night-the place a room, in opposite corners of which they were to stand. The seconds, having placed their men were to withdraw outside the door, taking the candles with them. The words should be given from without, when he who had the first fire should discharge his weapon, and the seconds bearing the light should immediately rush in.

These strange conditions were accepted, the time arrived, and the seconds placed the parties as agreed upon-withdrawing immediately and leaving the men in the dark. The word was given, the fire was heard, and there stood the eldest of the two bolt upwright in the corner, his adversary's ball having entered the wall so close to his head that the escape seemed little less than miraculous.

It was now the old soldier's turn to fire .--They were again left in dark, the word was again given from the outside, and instantaneously with the discharge, the seconds rushed in and found the challenger prostrate on the floor-not having yet recovered himself from the trick to avoid the ball, which, on examination, was found must have killed

The young man was covered with confusion, and the seconds were overwhelming him with expressions of their scorn, when the veteran stopped him.

"Not so fast, my young friends," said he, "you will grow wiser. Where do you suppose I was at the first fire? On my hands and knees in the corner; but ma foi! I was up quicker than he! Par Dieu! Messieurs, we are all cowards in the dark !"

It was afterwards whispered to our friend that the story was an acutual fact, and that the elder of the parties was no other than the brave warrior Excelmans himself.

The history of this medicine is peculiar. It has made its way to public favor selety by the force of its own intrinsis merits. No artificial mount have been used to give it as teriety and thrust it upon public attention. It has fever before even been advertised, but having first shown its remarkable efficacy in the family of the proprietor, and by him afterwards administered to his affilicted friends and acquaintance with a like result, its regulation gradually extended until it is known in the most distant parts of the Union, as a medicine of unrivalled virtues in the cure of Dyspepsia in all its different forms, and also for the cure of Ashma or Phthisic. Its only hernalt and its only sulogy has been the story of its wonderful efficacy, as told from mouth to mouth or by letter from friend to friend. In every instance where these litters have been used, and the result made known to the proprietor, they have proved a remedy.
