A Sketch.

LYDIA DARRAH THE QUAKERESS.

When the British held posssession of Philadelphia, Gen. Howe's head quarters were in Second street, the forth door below Spruce, in a house which was before occupied by Gen. Cadwallader. Directly opposite, resided William and Lydia Darrah, members of the Society of Friends. A superior officer in the British army, believed to be the Adjutant General, fixed upon one of the chambers, a back room, for private conference; two of them frequently met there, with fire and candles, in close consultation. About the 2d of December, the Adjutant General told Lydia that they would be in the room at 7 o'clock, and remain late; and that wished to retire early to bed, they would call her to let them out, and extinguish their fire and candles. She accordingly sent all the family to bed; but, as the officer had been so particular, her curiosity was excited. She took off her shoes, and put her ear to the key hole of the conclave. She overheard an order read for the British troops to march out, late in the evening of the fourth, and attack General Washington's areny, then encamped at White Marsh. On hearing this, she returned to her room and adding, that when they were going away, fourth, and attack General Washington's are any, then encamped at White Marsh. On hearing this, she returned to her room and faid herself down. Soon after, the officer knocked at her door, but she arose only at the third summons, having feigned to be asleep. Her mind was so agitated that from this moment, she could neither eat nor sleep; supposing it to be in her power to save the lives of thousands of her countrymen, but not knowing how she was to convey the necessary information to Geo. Washington, nor daring to confide it even to her husband. The time left, however was short; she quickly determined to make her way, quickly to the American outposts. She informed her family that, as they were in quickly to the American outposts. She informed her family that, as they were in want of flour, she would go to Frankford for some; her husband insisted that she should take with her the servant maid; but, to his surprise, she positively refused. She got access to General Howe, and solicited- For one capy of the Daily Globe during what he granted -- a pass through the British troops on the lines.

towards the American lines, and encountered an American Lieut. Colonel Craig, of the lookout for information. He knew her, and inquired whither she was going. She answered, in quest of her son, an officer in the slight and walk with her. He did so, ordering his troops to keep in sight. To him she disclosed her momentous secret, after having obtained from him the most solemn promise never to betray her individually, since her life might be at stake with the British. He conducted her to a house near at hand, directed a female in it to get her something to eat, and speeded for head quarters, where he made General Washington acquainted with what he had heard .-Washington made, of course, all preparations for baffling the meditated surprise.

up alone to watch the movements of the British troops; but when they returned in a few days after, did not dare to ask a question, though solicitons to learn the event -The next evening, the Adjutant General came in, and requested her to walk up to his room, as he wished to put some questions. She followed him up in terror, and when he locked the door, and begged her with an air of misery, to be scated, she was sure that she was either suspected or had been betrayed. He enquired earnestly whether any of the family were up the night he and the officers met ;-she told him that they had all retired at 10 o'clock. He observed-"I know you were asleep, for I knocked at your chamber three time before you heard me; I am entirely at a loss to know who gave General Washington information of our intended attack, unless the house could speak. When we arrived near White Marsh we found all their cannon mounted, and the troops prepared to receive us: and we have marched back like a parcel of fools."

Lydia returned home with her flour; sat
