Two souls from heaven. 'Twas simply offered-taken without thought-And, ere the evening's close, Much had been wrought

That absence, time, nor sorrow could efface ; And on the brow of each A seal was set, to teach That if we chase

A phantom danger, real may be near. They never thought of this, The resetud and the kiss, So long, so dear,

That followed it-the simple pledge of love-Awoke the wish that slept In the heart's secret crypt; Nor God above,

Nor man below, could check the burning flood Of passion sweeping on, Until all sense was gone Oh, treacherous bud!

If all thy leaves were multiplied as is The sand on the sea shore, Our tears for thee were more Than all of this!

'Iwas off r'd-taken - and the thoughts flew back To that it emblems oft; And all the emotions soft That in the track

Of passion follow, crowded round them there, In the still eve; their eyes Grew full, and the warm sighs That seem to bear The very soul of love on their light wings,

Flew from her parted lips; Can time—can death eclipse The light that brings The memory of that moment back to each,

With all i's life of life, Its passion and its strife? How cold is speech! How feebly, dimly can our words express What we have strongly felt ! Not mine the tongue to melt

To tenderness The listener's heart, and drew the genial flood Of pity from cold fountains, else There lines would stir full many a pulse;

Oh, treacherous bud! So simple wert thoe, that no tremor crossed Them; thou didst lead all silently Down to that ever surging sea WHERE ALL WAS LOST!
