ARTHUR SPRING.

This wretched criminal has but three more days to live. A marked change has come over him. He has relented much, and begins to exhibit a more becoming demeanor, as his moments on earth grow shorter.

The Inspectors of the Prison now refuse to admit any one at all to visit him in his cell, except his spiritual advisers. The object of this is to afford him proper opportunities to devote to reflection every moment of the brief period of time allowed for preperation to die.

Yesterday, the son of the felon visited him, and had two interviews with him. The meeting between them was most effecting .-A complete reconciliation took place. The guilty father clasped the son to his breastcried over him bitterly-called him his dear, darling boy-told him that he forgave him, and asked his forgiveness; while the boy wept upon his parent's neck. He begged young Arthur not to leave him, but to stay till the execution was over, and see his remains interred. He also cut off a lock of his hair, which he entrusted to Arthur to take to his orphaned daughters.

Young Arthur piteously and touchingly ap pealed to his father to exculpate him, and, although the culprit did not yield to the boy's entreaties, still he refrained from criminating his son. The elder Spring was greatly subdued after the meeting was over.

The following dialogue between them con tains some of the most affecting portions of the conversation, in which the son vainly endeavored to induce his father to clear him from the imputation of guilt in the murder He said-

"My father! my father! oh, have pity upon me! oh! have pity, and tell the truth! Do, O do, say I am innocens ! Oh, you know I am! My dear, dear father, you know I am innocent."

The father, thus appealed to, groaned aloud, and strained him to his bosom, with the most intense affection, answering : "My son, my darling, I will tell the truth ! 17 Eagerly seizing on the expression, the son followed up his weeping request. "Ca, my father, have pity upon me; oh do say I am innocent! You know I had nothing to do with the murder of the wo-

Still that man of iron nerve, although convalsed with agony, answered cautiously, and in general terms.

"My dear, dear boy, I will do whatever I can for you. I will die for you"

Another gush of grief relieved the swelling bosom of the weeping youth, and again, in the most affecting manner, he said :

"Oh, my father, my dear father, you know I love you. Oh that I could die in your stead. For what is life to me now? My course of misery is already begun. The gloomy future grows darker every day. You Hegins is not yet able to walk, having lost are soon to die; a few brief painful hours the use of his legs. His general health, will close your earthly sufferings: but mine oh, my father, my sufferings, where are they to terminate? I am already pointed at, and avoided. Where shall I hide my head, if you die without clearing me from the dreadful crime ? Oh, how can I bear to live !"

Then, in an agony of grief, he tenderly upbraided him.

"Oh, my father, my father, you have pity, you have no pity. You see me bowed down with grief and you will make it deeper and darker, by witholding the truth. Oh,

To all these touching appeals, the deeply agitated father returned indirect or evasive answers.

The father gently upbraided the son, as

"O my father, what could I do, when compelled to testify; I had to speak the truth -O forgive me, forgive me, dear father, my heart was with you, while my lips spoke the painful truth. O forgive me !"

Burns nor Ragan.12 "O yes, my dear father, all; O forgive all, and make your peace with Heaven." The gentlemen present knelt in solemn prayer, for the weeping parent and agonized child. Afterwards they proposed to leave them alone for a little while, thus addressing the father: "Arthur, the world has condemned you as no longer fit to live. It has been reported, that you said, that if you could get hold of your son, you would kill him. We shall now give you an opportunity to show the world, that you are not the heartless man you are reported to be 22 With a face suffused with tears, he clasped him to his bosom exclaiming, "my darling, my darling, I would not injure a hair of your

Their parting was still more effecting .-The father clasping his son to his breast, kissed him repeatedly upon his lips, telling he next saw them, and finally gave him one fond kiss for himself.
