A WOMAN'S QUESTION.

The following beautiful piece of poetry is taken from a new work entitled "Legends of Lyrics," recently published in London, by Adelaide Anne Proctor—a daughter of Barry Cornwall:

Before I trust my fate to thee,
Or place my hand in thine,
Before I let my future go
Color and form to thee,
Before I part for thee, question thy soul
To-night for me.

I break all slighter bonds, nor feel
A shadow of regret,
Is there one link within the Past
That holds thy spirit yet?
Or is thy Faith as clear and free as that
Which I can pledge to thee?

Does there within thy dimmed dreams,
A possible future shine,
Wherein thy life could henceforth breathe
Untouched, unshared by mine?
If so, at any pain or cost, oh, tell me before
All is lost.

Look deeper still. If thou canst feel
Within thy inmost soul,
That thou hast kept a portion back,
Which I have staked the whole,
Let no false pity spare the blow, but in true mercy tell me so.

Is there within thy heart a need
That mine cannot fulfill?
One chord that any other hand
Could not vibrate with all power?
Speak now—lest at some future day, my whole life wither and decay
Lives there within thy nature hid
The demon-panic change,
Sliding a passing glory still
On all things new and strange?
It may be that I may be a shield
Heart against thy own.

Couldst thou withdraw thy hand one day
And answer to my claim,
That Fate and that to-day's mistake,
Not thou—had been to blame?
Some other's conscience thus: but thou
Oh, surely, that wilt warn me now,
Nay, answer not—I dare not hear,
The words would come too late;
Yet I would spare thee all remorse,
So comfort me my Fate,
Whatever on my heart may fall—remember
I could risk it all.

THE KINLOCH ESPATE.

AND HOW IT WAS SETTLED.

CHAPTER VI.

Sunday was a great day in Innisfield; for there, as in all certain communities, religion had the highest place. The church was full, and the bell rang for service, every ear in town heard it, and all who were not sick or kept at home by the care of young children, turned their steps toward the house of God. The idea that there could be any choice between going to hear preaching and remaining at home was as preposterous, that it never entered into the minds of any but the openly wicked.—Whatever might be their inclinations, few had the hardness of heart to resist themselves from meeting, still less to ride out for pleasure, or to stroll through the woods or upon the bank of the river. A steady succession of vehicles—"through-braced" wagons, a few more stylish carriages with elliptic springs, and here and there a motor omnibus—issued from the town to the meeting-house. The horses, from the veteran of twenty years' service down to the untrimmied and half-trained colt, knew what the proprietors of the day required, and they trotted solemnly, with faces as sad as their drivers', and never stopped to look in the fence-corners as they passed along, to see what they could find to be frightened at.—Nor would they often disturb worship by any noisy or unruly behavior, as was the case in the length of the sermon.

Mr. Hardwick and his family, as we have before mentioned went regularly to meeting; Lizzy and Mark sat with him in the singers' seats, the others in a pew below. The only guardian of the house, a sturdy old man, with a long white beard, named Caesar. The habits of this dog deserve a brief mention. On all ordinary occasions he followed his master or others of the family, seeming to take a human interest in their company. Whether it was desirable to have him remain at home, nothing short of tying him would answer the purpose. After a time he came to know the signs of preparation, and would sneak up on his hind legs, as Mr. Hardwick would tell the boys to catch a mouse, so that he should not follow, but he was not to be found, and in course of ten minutes he would be trotting after his master as compositely as if nothing had ever happened to interrupt their friendly meeting. It was impossible to resist such persevering affection, and at length Mr. Hardwick gave up the contest, and allowed Caesar to travel when and where he chose.—But on Sunday he sat on the front-door step, spect upon his haunches, with one ear drooping forward, and the other upright, like the point of a starched shirt collar; and though on week-days he was fond of paying the usual courtesies to his canine acquaintances, and (if the truth must be told) barking at strange horses occasionally, yet nothing could induce him either to follow any of the family, or to cost a dog, or chase after foreign vehicles, on the day of rest. Once only he forgot what was due to his character, and gave a few yelps in holy time. But James with a glance at his father, who was stoutly opposed to Caesar's conduct, was justifiable, inasmuch as the man he barked at was one of a band of new-light fanatics who worshipped in the school-house, and the horse, moreover, was not shod at a respectable place, but at the tinker's shop in the verge of the town—a dog with such powers of discrimination certainly merits a place in this history.—The services of Sunday were finished.—Those who had dined and caraway had vainly struggled against drowsiness, had waked up with a jerk at the benediction, and moved with their neighbors along the aisles, a slow and sluggish stream. The nearest friends passed each side by with meekly composed faces, and without greeting each other until they reached the vestibule. So slow and solemn was the progress out of church that many James Hardwick averred that he saw the Deacon take a short nap, and waked up with a jerk at the benediction, and moved with their neighbors along the aisles, a slow and sluggish stream.
