

The last few days of warm weather brought a large addition of visitors to this popular and fashionable watering place.

The facilities afforded by the railroad to Cape May visitors, since its completion, is of great importance.

On returning from Cape May I stopped over night and remained most of the next day at Vineland.

The following is the communication of the actor Mathews, to the National Intelligencer, concerning his connection with the letter entrusted to him by Booth:

WASHINGTON, July 17, 1867. EDITORS INTELLIGENCER: GENTLEMEN: Much has been said in the public prints in regard to the missing letter of John Wilkes Booth.

It was on the afternoon of Gold Friday, April 14, 1865, at about four o'clock, that I met John Wilkes Booth (on horseback) on Pennsylvania avenue, at the triangular enclosure between Thirtieth and Fourteenth streets.

At that moment I observed General Grant riding in an open carriage, carrying also his baggage. Seeing this, I called Mr. Booth's attention to him, and said, "Why, Johnny, there goes Grant. I thought he was coming to the theatre this evening with the President."

It is generally supposed that Jersey is the great peach State. This is not so. Delaware takes the lead.

The more intelligent men of the South who have hitherto sided with the President in his quarrel with Congress, begin to perceive that Mr. Johnson, whatever may be his intentions, is practically the worst enemy of the South, and the main obstacle in the way of proper relations between that portion of the country and the National Government.

"Will the Republican party who passed this act, and who have resolutely supported the action of the military commanders, desert Gen. Sickles in such a case? Why not the issue thus made become a party issue, and who is to pay the costs of the controversy but our unfortunate selves? This is not the first time that we have been made to pay for our confidence in the President.

Now for the contents of the letter. It was written on a sheet of commercial note paper, covering three pages. The first two pages were written in the spirit and style of the Philadelphia letter, and it was only at the concluding paragraph that anything was said bearing upon what had transpired.

At a reconstruction meeting held near Jackson, Miss., July 4, Hon. Albert G. Brown (who was Jeff. Davis' colleague in the United States Senate) presided, and said: "He had spent thirty years in the public service."

The President is disposed to make another investment in real estate for the benefit of the nation. He is said to be negotiating a treaty whereby the British Government on the Pacific coast will be taken in settlement of the Alabama claims.

THE PRESIDENT'S VETO.

In any trial of strength between Andrew Johnson and the people, Andrew Johnson will be overthrown. Of this he has no fear.

On the back of each of these same legal tender notes issued under the act of February 25, 1862, will be found the following "endorsement" of the people of the United States:

In 1862 all the bonds of the United States were gold-bearing; hence the restriction in the endorsement, which is, however, in favor and to the benefit of creditors of the Government—the men who had lent it money to carry on the war and pay the soldiers.

With the Press we join in asking if the individual sovereigns of the country—the endorsers of the Government money—will vote for or against the man who impugned their paper at the very time when their credit was in peril?

THE BOOTH LETTER. The following is the communication of the actor Mathews, to the National Intelligencer, concerning his connection with the letter entrusted to him by Booth:

WASHINGTON, July 17, 1867. EDITORS INTELLIGENCER: GENTLEMEN: Much has been said in the public prints in regard to the missing letter of John Wilkes Booth.

It was on the afternoon of Gold Friday, April 14, 1865, at about four o'clock, that I met John Wilkes Booth (on horseback) on Pennsylvania avenue, at the triangular enclosure between Thirtieth and Fourteenth streets.

At that moment I observed General Grant riding in an open carriage, carrying also his baggage. Seeing this, I called Mr. Booth's attention to him, and said, "Why, Johnny, there goes Grant. I thought he was coming to the theatre this evening with the President."

It is generally supposed that Jersey is the great peach State. This is not so. Delaware takes the lead. The Jersey crop is estimated at two hundred thousand baskets, while little Delaware will produce over a million of baskets, or six times as many as her Jersey rival.

The more intelligent men of the South who have hitherto sided with the President in his quarrel with Congress, begin to perceive that Mr. Johnson, whatever may be his intentions, is practically the worst enemy of the South, and the main obstacle in the way of proper relations between that portion of the country and the National Government.

Now for the contents of the letter. It was written on a sheet of commercial note paper, covering three pages. The first two pages were written in the spirit and style of the Philadelphia letter, and it was only at the concluding paragraph that anything was said bearing upon what had transpired.

At a reconstruction meeting held near Jackson, Miss., July 4, Hon. Albert G. Brown (who was Jeff. Davis' colleague in the United States Senate) presided, and said: "He had spent thirty years in the public service."

The President is disposed to make another investment in real estate for the benefit of the nation. He is said to be negotiating a treaty whereby the British Government on the Pacific coast will be taken in settlement of the Alabama claims.

THE PRESIDENT'S VETO.

In any trial of strength between Andrew Johnson and the people, Andrew Johnson will be overthrown. Of this he has no fear.

On the back of each of these same legal tender notes issued under the act of February 25, 1862, will be found the following "endorsement" of the people of the United States:

In 1862 all the bonds of the United States were gold-bearing; hence the restriction in the endorsement, which is, however, in favor and to the benefit of creditors of the Government—the men who had lent it money to carry on the war and pay the soldiers.

With the Press we join in asking if the individual sovereigns of the country—the endorsers of the Government money—will vote for or against the man who impugned their paper at the very time when their credit was in peril?

THE BOOTH LETTER. The following is the communication of the actor Mathews, to the National Intelligencer, concerning his connection with the letter entrusted to him by Booth:

WASHINGTON, July 17, 1867. EDITORS INTELLIGENCER: GENTLEMEN: Much has been said in the public prints in regard to the missing letter of John Wilkes Booth.

It was on the afternoon of Gold Friday, April 14, 1865, at about four o'clock, that I met John Wilkes Booth (on horseback) on Pennsylvania avenue, at the triangular enclosure between Thirtieth and Fourteenth streets.

At that moment I observed General Grant riding in an open carriage, carrying also his baggage. Seeing this, I called Mr. Booth's attention to him, and said, "Why, Johnny, there goes Grant. I thought he was coming to the theatre this evening with the President."

It is generally supposed that Jersey is the great peach State. This is not so. Delaware takes the lead. The Jersey crop is estimated at two hundred thousand baskets, while little Delaware will produce over a million of baskets, or six times as many as her Jersey rival.

The more intelligent men of the South who have hitherto sided with the President in his quarrel with Congress, begin to perceive that Mr. Johnson, whatever may be his intentions, is practically the worst enemy of the South, and the main obstacle in the way of proper relations between that portion of the country and the National Government.

Now for the contents of the letter. It was written on a sheet of commercial note paper, covering three pages. The first two pages were written in the spirit and style of the Philadelphia letter, and it was only at the concluding paragraph that anything was said bearing upon what had transpired.

At a reconstruction meeting held near Jackson, Miss., July 4, Hon. Albert G. Brown (who was Jeff. Davis' colleague in the United States Senate) presided, and said: "He had spent thirty years in the public service."

The President is disposed to make another investment in real estate for the benefit of the nation. He is said to be negotiating a treaty whereby the British Government on the Pacific coast will be taken in settlement of the Alabama claims.

THE PRESIDENT'S VETO.

In any trial of strength between Andrew Johnson and the people, Andrew Johnson will be overthrown. Of this he has no fear.

On the back of each of these same legal tender notes issued under the act of February 25, 1862, will be found the following "endorsement" of the people of the United States:

In 1862 all the bonds of the United States were gold-bearing; hence the restriction in the endorsement, which is, however, in favor and to the benefit of creditors of the Government—the men who had lent it money to carry on the war and pay the soldiers.

With the Press we join in asking if the individual sovereigns of the country—the endorsers of the Government money—will vote for or against the man who impugned their paper at the very time when their credit was in peril?

THE BOOTH LETTER. The following is the communication of the actor Mathews, to the National Intelligencer, concerning his connection with the letter entrusted to him by Booth:

WASHINGTON, July 17, 1867. EDITORS INTELLIGENCER: GENTLEMEN: Much has been said in the public prints in regard to the missing letter of John Wilkes Booth.

It was on the afternoon of Gold Friday, April 14, 1865, at about four o'clock, that I met John Wilkes Booth (on horseback) on Pennsylvania avenue, at the triangular enclosure between Thirtieth and Fourteenth streets.

At that moment I observed General Grant riding in an open carriage, carrying also his baggage. Seeing this, I called Mr. Booth's attention to him, and said, "Why, Johnny, there goes Grant. I thought he was coming to the theatre this evening with the President."

It is generally supposed that Jersey is the great peach State. This is not so. Delaware takes the lead. The Jersey crop is estimated at two hundred thousand baskets, while little Delaware will produce over a million of baskets, or six times as many as her Jersey rival.

The more intelligent men of the South who have hitherto sided with the President in his quarrel with Congress, begin to perceive that Mr. Johnson, whatever may be his intentions, is practically the worst enemy of the South, and the main obstacle in the way of proper relations between that portion of the country and the National Government.

Now for the contents of the letter. It was written on a sheet of commercial note paper, covering three pages. The first two pages were written in the spirit and style of the Philadelphia letter, and it was only at the concluding paragraph that anything was said bearing upon what had transpired.

At a reconstruction meeting held near Jackson, Miss., July 4, Hon. Albert G. Brown (who was Jeff. Davis' colleague in the United States Senate) presided, and said: "He had spent thirty years in the public service."

The President is disposed to make another investment in real estate for the benefit of the nation. He is said to be negotiating a treaty whereby the British Government on the Pacific coast will be taken in settlement of the Alabama claims.

THE PRESIDENT'S VETO.

In any trial of strength between Andrew Johnson and the people, Andrew Johnson will be overthrown. Of this he has no fear.

On the back of each of these same legal tender notes issued under the act of February 25, 1862, will be found the following "endorsement" of the people of the United States:

In 1862 all the bonds of the United States were gold-bearing; hence the restriction in the endorsement, which is, however, in favor and to the benefit of creditors of the Government—the men who had lent it money to carry on the war and pay the soldiers.

With the Press we join in asking if the individual sovereigns of the country—the endorsers of the Government money—will vote for or against the man who impugned their paper at the very time when their credit was in peril?

THE BOOTH LETTER. The following is the communication of the actor Mathews, to the National Intelligencer, concerning his connection with the letter entrusted to him by Booth:

WASHINGTON, July 17, 1867. EDITORS INTELLIGENCER: GENTLEMEN: Much has been said in the public prints in regard to the missing letter of John Wilkes Booth.

It was on the afternoon of Gold Friday, April 14, 1865, at about four o'clock, that I met John Wilkes Booth (on horseback) on Pennsylvania avenue, at the triangular enclosure between Thirtieth and Fourteenth streets.

At that moment I observed General Grant riding in an open carriage, carrying also his baggage. Seeing this, I called Mr. Booth's attention to him, and said, "Why, Johnny, there goes Grant. I thought he was coming to the theatre this evening with the President."

It is generally supposed that Jersey is the great peach State. This is not so. Delaware takes the lead. The Jersey crop is estimated at two hundred thousand baskets, while little Delaware will produce over a million of baskets, or six times as many as her Jersey rival.

The more intelligent men of the South who have hitherto sided with the President in his quarrel with Congress, begin to perceive that Mr. Johnson, whatever may be his intentions, is practically the worst enemy of the South, and the main obstacle in the way of proper relations between that portion of the country and the National Government.

Now for the contents of the letter. It was written on a sheet of commercial note paper, covering three pages. The first two pages were written in the spirit and style of the Philadelphia letter, and it was only at the concluding paragraph that anything was said bearing upon what had transpired.

At a reconstruction meeting held near Jackson, Miss., July 4, Hon. Albert G. Brown (who was Jeff. Davis' colleague in the United States Senate) presided, and said: "He had spent thirty years in the public service."

The President is disposed to make another investment in real estate for the benefit of the nation. He is said to be negotiating a treaty whereby the British Government on the Pacific coast will be taken in settlement of the Alabama claims.

THE PRESIDENT'S VETO.

In any trial of strength between Andrew Johnson and the people, Andrew Johnson will be overthrown. Of this he has no fear.

On the back of each of these same legal tender notes issued under the act of February 25, 1862, will be found the following "endorsement" of the people of the United States:

In 1862 all the bonds of the United States were gold-bearing; hence the restriction in the endorsement, which is, however, in favor and to the benefit of creditors of the Government—the men who had lent it money to carry on the war and pay the soldiers.

With the Press we join in asking if the individual sovereigns of the country—the endorsers of the Government money—will vote for or against the man who impugned their paper at the very time when their credit was in peril?

THE BOOTH LETTER. The following is the communication of the actor Mathews, to the National Intelligencer, concerning his connection with the letter entrusted to him by Booth:

WASHINGTON, July 17, 1867. EDITORS INTELLIGENCER: GENTLEMEN: Much has been said in the public prints in regard to the missing letter of John Wilkes Booth.

It was on the afternoon of Gold Friday, April 14, 1865, at about four o'clock, that I met John Wilkes Booth (on horseback) on Pennsylvania avenue, at the triangular enclosure between Thirtieth and Fourteenth streets.

At that moment I observed General Grant riding in an open carriage, carrying also his baggage. Seeing this, I called Mr. Booth's attention to him, and said, "Why, Johnny, there goes Grant. I thought he was coming to the theatre this evening with the President."

It is generally supposed that Jersey is the great peach State. This is not so. Delaware takes the lead. The Jersey crop is estimated at two hundred thousand baskets, while little Delaware will produce over a million of baskets, or six times as many as her Jersey rival.

The more intelligent men of the South who have hitherto sided with the President in his quarrel with Congress, begin to perceive that Mr. Johnson, whatever may be his intentions, is practically the worst enemy of the South, and the main obstacle in the way of proper relations between that portion of the country and the National Government.

Now for the contents of the letter. It was written on a sheet of commercial note paper, covering three pages. The first two pages were written in the spirit and style of the Philadelphia letter, and it was only at the concluding paragraph that anything was said bearing upon what had transpired.

At a reconstruction meeting held near Jackson, Miss., July 4, Hon. Albert G. Brown (who was Jeff. Davis' colleague in the United States Senate) presided, and said: "He had spent thirty years in the public service."

The President is disposed to make another investment in real estate for the benefit of the nation. He is said to be negotiating a treaty whereby the British Government on the Pacific coast will be taken in settlement of the Alabama claims.

THE PRESIDENT'S VETO.

In any trial of strength between Andrew Johnson and the people, Andrew Johnson will be overthrown. Of this he has no fear.

On the back of each of these same legal tender notes issued under the act of February 25, 1862, will be found the following "endorsement" of the people of the United States:

In 1862 all the bonds of the United States were gold-bearing; hence the restriction in the endorsement, which is, however, in favor and to the benefit of creditors of the Government—the men who had lent it money to carry on the war and pay the soldiers.

With the Press we join in asking if the individual sovereigns of the country—the endorsers of the Government money—will vote for or against the man who impugned their paper at the very time when their credit was in peril?

THE BOOTH LETTER. The following is the communication of the actor Mathews, to the National Intelligencer, concerning his connection with the letter entrusted to him by Booth:

WASHINGTON, July 17, 1867. EDITORS INTELLIGENCER: GENTLEMEN: Much has been said in the public prints in regard to the missing letter of John Wilkes Booth.

It was on the afternoon of Gold Friday, April 14, 1865, at about four o'clock, that I met John Wilkes Booth (on horseback) on Pennsylvania avenue, at the triangular enclosure between Thirtieth and Fourteenth streets.

At that moment I observed General Grant riding in an open carriage, carrying also his baggage. Seeing this, I called Mr. Booth's attention to him, and said, "Why, Johnny, there goes Grant. I thought he was coming to the theatre this evening with the President."

It is generally supposed that Jersey is the great peach State. This is not so. Delaware takes the lead. The Jersey crop is estimated at two hundred thousand baskets, while little Delaware will produce over a million of baskets, or six times as many as her Jersey rival.

The more intelligent men of the South who have hitherto sided with the President in his quarrel with Congress, begin to perceive that Mr. Johnson, whatever may be his intentions, is practically the worst enemy of the South, and the main obstacle in the way of proper relations between that portion of the country and the National Government.

Now for the contents of the letter. It was written on a sheet of commercial note paper, covering three pages. The first two pages were written in the spirit and style of the Philadelphia letter, and it was only at the concluding paragraph that anything was said bearing upon what had transpired.

At a reconstruction meeting held near Jackson, Miss., July 4, Hon. Albert G. Brown (who was Jeff. Davis' colleague in the United States Senate) presided, and said: "He had spent thirty years in the public service."

The President is disposed to make another investment in real estate for the benefit of the nation. He is said to be negotiating a treaty whereby the British Government on the Pacific coast will be taken in settlement of the Alabama claims.