Turnover plagues student organizations

By KEVIN McCANEY Collegian Staff Writer

Graduation sends thousands of students out into the world every year. It also depletes the experienced ranks of many campus organizations. Some groups face a high turnover rate and one is threatened with extinction.

The Associated Student Activities (ASA) Budget Committee will experience one of the largest turnovers of any organization.

The committee, which is responsible for hearing funding requests and allocating money to all other student groups, will have only one definite returning member and one other possible returnee on its nine-member staff.

One organization threatened with termination is the Undergraduate Student Government Department of Budget and Finance. "If there is no interest very soon, it will probably be defunct next year," Al Leard, one of the department's four co-directors, said.

The budget and finance department is a small group aimed at researching student finances and opening and maintaining lines of communication with the University.

A lack of experience within ASA may result in chaos, according to the one returning member, Jami Wintz, who has applied for the chairmanship.

She said she has doubts about her chances of getting the job, because she will be a senior and the committee generally prefers to appoint a younger chairman. But whether she is appointed or not, Wintz said, she thinks the committee will lack experience.

She said knowing how the committee works and being familiar with the organizations — for example, knowing a particular group's status from the year before — are always important factors in the committee's decisions. She said it took her about six months after she joined to get used to the system.

Mel Klein, director of ASA, said he doesn't think the problem is that bad, although there is difficulty familiarizing new members or a new chairman with procedures.

"I have a role there in providing continuity and filling in the members on the history of procedures," he said. Knowing those procedures is the only training a member receives, but he said that training, and "a general knowledge of this kind of thing," have proven sufficient in the past.

Klein also said that ASA will receive its annual allocation of approximately $119,000 in the spring, when the current committee will fund the majority of student groups' activities for the next year.

Wintz said the committee had problems this year with the three returning members and chairman. With potentially eight of the nine members unfamiliar with the system, she said, it could be "the blind leading the blind."

Structural problems will be the least of worries for the budget and finance department, which has been described as an "ongoing process with long-term goals." The department, however, is a little more than a year old, and Leard said only one of those "long-term goals" — the peer counseling group for student financial aid — receives strong department attention. "We'll try to keep that going," Leard said.

Since all of the co-directors are seniors, the committee's chances of staying alive are slim, he said. What it's suffering from, Leard said, is lack of interest, both from students and USG itself. "We said at the beginning we weren't going to go to them, and they haven't come to us," Leard said.

As for other organizations under the USG banner, USG President W. T. Williams said the turnover "won't be as bad as I thought it was going to be a couple of months ago," noting that most groups have been training their underclassmen.

He said all the department heads are seniors, but with the possible exception of Paul Stevenson, director of the Department of Political Affairs, all have capable replacements. Stevenson has a lot of knowledge of the ins and outs of political affairs and will be hard to replace right away, Williams said.

A good example of the kind of transition some groups can go through is the Organization of Town Independent Students. According to Dean Moore, OTIS president, though that organization now enjoys a membership of about 55, they started the year in September with only about 12, a situation which threatened its existence.

Senate expected to approve Warnke bid

WASHINGTON (UPI) — Foes of Paul Warnke, President Carter's choice as chief U.S. disarmament negotiator, assailed him yesterday as too trustful of the Soviets but his supporters predicted solid Senate approval of the nomination.

Senate Republican Whip Ted Stevens of Alaska predicted Warnke "will come close to not being confirmed by the Senate."

But Sen. Dick Clark, D-Iowa, of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and one of Warnke's most enthusiastic backers, predicted the former assistant secretary of defense will win Senate confirmation with possibly 25 opposing votes.

As head of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, Warnke would be the main American negotiator with the Russians for a new strategic arms limitation agreement.

Sen. James L. McClure, R-Idaho, in testimony prepared for a second day of confirmation hearings by the Foreign Relations Committee, called on the entire Senate to oppose Warnke.

"Instead of toughening the bargaining position of the United States with the Soviets, as President Carter promised," McClure said, "I believe the addition of Mr. Warnke to the negotiating team can only undermine any credible American posture."

He said Warnke did not recognize the dangers of the aggressive Soviet arms buildup, and relied unduly on the hope that unilateral restraint would be reciprocated by the Soviet Union.

He told the committee Warnke "thinks domestic issues are more important than strategic issues, otherwise he would not have recommended big defense cuts" as a Pentagon assistant secretary.

Nitze said, "If the United States had followed Warnke's defense assertions, the United States would be in worse shape than we are in today."

Warnke, testifying Tuesday, stressed his support for a strong national defense and opposition to unilateral disarmament.

But Rep. Samuel Stratton, D-N.Y., of the House Armed Services Committee, following him before the committee, said Warnke as chief U.S. negotiator on SALT II would be "the wrong man in the wrong job at the wrong time."

Howard Baker of Tennessee has said he does not believe the Warnke nomination is in danger. Democratic leader Robert Byrd of West Virginia has not hazarded a guess, and has reserved his personal position.

"I have real trouble with Warnke," Stevens told an informal news conference of reporters in his Senate office Wednesday. "I think he's going to come close to not being confirmed."

"I don't think we'll believe Mr. Warnke. I'm not sure that his judgment is going to be trusted."
