Gas suspected in Pittsburgh explosion

PITTSBURGH (AP) — An unidentified gas caused the explosion at a University of Pittsburgh lecture hall last month in which two people died, a university investigator testified yesterday.

"The evidence is overwhelming that it was gas," said Dr. Maurice Sussman during a break at a coroner's hearing into the Jan. 20 blast, which killed two women and destroyed a part of Langley Hall.

"It could have been due to methane from some gas pit or it is possible it was natural gas from a leak," said Sussman, chairman of the Life Science Department and head of a university committee formed to examine the explosion.

Another witness, Capt. Norman Sanner of the Pittsburgh Fire Department agreed that the gas could have been methane or natural, but he also said he hasn't ruled out propane.

Sanner, however, disagreed with Sussman's theory on the exact location of the explosion.

Sussman and a city detective said the blast originated in a crawl-space located on the ground floor between an electron microscope laboratory and a lecture hall.

But Sanner said the point of origin was in an adjacent electron microscope laboratory.

Both Sussman and Sanner testified there were two explosions. "From eyewitnesses we have concluded there were two explosions, a soft-crump and then a loud bang," Sussman said.

Sanner said that tests made Jan. 21 indicated there was no natural gas present in the microscope laboratory. The tests, however were made before the discovery of an unused, broken pipe that contained natural gas.

That pipe and another pipe from the building's basement were shipped by Equitable Gas Co. to a metallurgical consulting firm in Texas for analysis.

Allegheny County Coroner Cyril Wecht successfully subpoenaed Equitable to obtain the pipes and utility reports related to the explosion. Utility officials were scheduled to testify later in the hearing.

By chance the explosion was recorded on a tape recorder operating in another nearby lecture hall, Room 223.
