

Website of the week

By Seamas O'Toole
staff writer

Depending on one's major, finding a summer internship can be very easy, or it can be horribly difficult. Many employers advertise their internship positions on the Internet, but the student searching for a job may have to sort through hundreds and hundreds of companies' websites before he or she finds what they are looking for. An easier way to find an internship position is to point one's browser toward www.entermag.com/jobsnow. At Jobs Now, students can search for a job anywhere in the United States. All one has to do is choose the type of internship they are looking for and a city and state. Jobs Now will produce a list of matches to the student's request. One can even search for apartment listings on the same site if they choose to take an internship away from home. Jobs Now even features a resume storage capability so employers can search the site for potential employees. Jobs Now can also be used to find higher-level jobs besides internships, so the site is not just for students.

Before one can start using the site, a short form must be filled out to register for a username. However, this process takes only a few seconds, and is completely free.

The Beacon will feature a new website every week.

In Remembrance: Those who died in 1998

By Jon Stubbs
entertainment editor

If one can look past all of the political turmoil that gained most of the media's attention in 1998, he or she would realize that the entertainment world lost some really outstanding individuals. Some of those who passed away had become legends in their own time, and some were well on their way to attaining that status. Let us look back to this past year's tragic losses, not to weep over their departures, but to recognize the contributions that they made to show business.

Flip Wilson 1935 - 1998

Born Clerow Wilson in New Jersey, Flip Wilson grew up in poverty, being moved in and out of foster homes. Wilson dropped out of high school at age 16 and later joined the Air Force, where he earned his nickname because of his sense of humor.

The Flip Wilson Show stretched four seasons from 1970 - 1974, and rated number two in the country during its first two seasons. "I wasn't the first black to headline a variety show," Wilson once said. "but I was the first with a successful variety show. My show went on right after the assassinations of Martin Luther King, Jr. and Robert Kennedy, and racial turmoil was at its peak. And my show clicked with people of all races and backgrounds."

Flip Wilson is survived by his four grown children. He never married; his passion was for motorcycles. "If I could marry my motorcycle, I'd roll her right up to the altar," he once joked.

Phil Hartman 1948 - 1998

Phil Hartman was born in Brantford, Ontario, Canada, but spent most of his childhood in Connecticut and then in Southern California. Hartman attended California State University of Northridge and studied graphic design. He went on to design album covers for rock bands, including Crosby, Stills and Nash.

Before joining the cast of Saturday Night Live in 1986, he worked in an L.A. based comedy troupe with Jon Lovitz and Paul Reubens (Pee-Wee Herman). He appeared frequently on Pee-Wee's Playhouse and co-wrote the 1985 classic, Pee-Wee's Big Adventure.

Hartman proved to be a very versatile actor for the show, playing characters that range from the Anal-Retentive Fisherman to the Unfrozen Caveman Lawyer. He left the show in 1995 and went on to star on the NBC sitcom News Radio. He also did voices for several Simpsons characters, including the infamous Lionel Hutz, an attorney who works at "I Can't Believe It's a Law Firm!"

Apparently murdered by his wife in a horrible murder-suicide, Hartman is survived by his two young children.

Harry Caray 1920 - 1998

For the first time since 1944, Major League Baseball began without the voice of Harry Caray. Caray was born Harry Christopher Carabina in St. Louis and orphaned at the age of seven. He later changed his name at the request of a Joliet, IL radio station manager.

Caray became famous as the voice of the Chicago Cubs, broadcasting live from Wrigley Field. He is also well known for singing "Take Me Out to the Ball Game" over the stadium PA during the seventh inning stretch.

"Look, I have to inform the fan, even if it hurts the player," Caray once said. "If a guy strikes out four times with the bases loaded, what do you say? He had a good swing? Who cares? I don't blast players. I just report what they do, and if they do badly they get a bad report. I work the way I do because I'm just an inveterate fan who happens to be behind the mike."

Caray was also known for being somewhat of a drinker. Even after a stroke in 1987, he continued to drink. However, Harry Caray knew that his days were limited, just like anyone else's. "I have often gotten emotional at the end of a season," Caray said. "First of all, as you get older the realization hits that there is an end somewhere down the line. And when the curtain comes down on the season, you can't help but think: 'Who knows? This might be the last one.' And that thought always is with me. I am not ashamed of it. It is a matter of fact. Nobody is immortal."

Francis Albert Sinatra 1915 - 1998

It's a fool who tries to summarize the life of Frank Sinatra in a few lines, but it would be a crime to ignore his passing. Born in Hoboken, New Jersey, Sinatra began singing as a child in the mid-twenties and then went on to take on the world. No magazine article or newspaper clipping could begin to tell the tale of the Chairman's life or career. The reader is urged to take a look at the Sinatra autobiography, All or Nothing at All.

These are only a few of the entertainers we lost in 1998. However, the men mentioned above were not just celebrities, they were groundbreakers, extremely talented performers, and believe it or not, real people with genuine personalities. Really, would anybody care if Tammy Faye Baker just keeled over? Most likely they wouldn't. It was these individuals' dedication to their art, their ability to communicate with the average person that made these individuals famous and also makes their passing so much more unfortunate.
