PENN STATE NEWS

Penn State and Napster to make legal tunes available for students

Penn State University announced this week it is going to revolutionize the music world with a ground-breaking agreement with the online music service Napster. Speaking in California at the annual EDUCAUSE meeting of thousands of information technology administrators from universities around the country, Penn State President Graham B. Spanier said the University has signed an agreement with Napster to launch a program in which Penn State will make Napster's Premium Service available at no cost to its students. The program will be phased-in beginning Jan. 12, 2004, the first day of classes for Penn State's spring semester. The Penn State-Napster agreement, and other similar arrangements expected to be formed by universities around the country, could revolutionize the way millions of college students obtain and listen to music through streaming audio and song file downloads via high-speed Internet and campus connections - all in a completely legal manner that complies with copyright laws.

Dave Matthews to bring some friends to the Jordan Center

Dave Matthews & Friends are on tour and stopping at the Bryce Jordan Center on Penn State's University Park campus at 7 p.m. Dec. 12. This tour marks the first time the singer/guitarist has toured with a group of musicians other than the Dave Matthews Band. Tickets go on sale Saturday at 10 a.m. and are priced at $46.50. Reserved tickets are available at the Bryce Jordan Ticket Center, Eisenhower Auditorium, Hetzel Union Building, Penn State Downtown Theatre Center, select Uni-Marts, the Altoona Campus ticket outlet; or charge by phone at (814) 865-5555 or (800) 863-3336.

University picked for approach to reducing HIV risk

Penn State is one of six universities chosen nationwide by the National Association for Student Affairs Administrators (NASPA) Health Education Leadership Program (HELP) to serve as a demonstration site for an innovative approach to HIV risk reduction. Each site will incorporate an environmental framework in the planning and implementation of campus health and wellness programs in an effort to reduce college students' risk of HIV infection. Student Affairs staff, faculty, students and community members collaborated on a strategic plan aimed at reducing risk of HIV infection on the University Park campus using "An Ecological Approach to Campus Health."
